Fossil-hunter unearths Surrey dinosaur

By John Witherow

A Surrey plumber emerged yesterday as the man responsible for what the Natural History Museum, in a fit of enthusiasm, described as possibly "the most important find in Britain this century". Mr William Walker, aged 55, of Springfield Road, Thornton Heath, an amateur fossil collector with a penchant for digging around in the mud at weekends, has torned up the skeleton of an unknown species of carnivorous dinosaur, dating back 124

Carnivorous skeletons are rare and only one other has been found in Britain, although small collections have been discovered over southern England. Dinosaurs did not venture north of Watford, one expert said.

While the museum pieces together the skeleton over the next few months with a view to public display, they will also have the difficult problem of finding a new name for the creature. Records 'not kept'

A progressive school in Coventry has been ctiticized for failing to use the proper procedures for appointing teachers and for derogatory remarks made by senior male staff to women teachers.

The criticism comes in a report of a formal investigation into Sidney Stringer School by the Equal Opportunities Commission, which said that because of the lack of proper school records it had impossible to glean what lay behind appointments and behind appointments promotions.

The commission says it was concerned that 40 teachers complained that there had been a strong bias against women in appointments and promotions. It found that decisions on many of the appointments between January, 1976, and January, 1979, were taken by the head without consulting the governors, as he should.

The commission ommends that Coventry's director of education should cusure that proper records are

Everything that happens now in the Labour leadership contest has to be assessed on the assumption that Mr Kinnock is going to win. Of the other three in the race, only Mr Hattersley is a serious rival - and there is almost certainly nothing that he could now do that would give him a chance of overtaking Mr kinnock. Yet this makes Mr Hattersley's personal manifesto, A Daty To Win, more not less interesting.

If he believes that this forthright statement of his position will somehow give im a possibility of victory, he is wasting bis time. If he believes that it will improve his prospects of being elected deputy leader, he is probably miscalculating. It should strengthen the confi-dence of those who have been wondering whether he has the stomach to fight for his convictions - but most of these people, whatever their doubts. would have voted for him rather than for Mr Michael Meacher anyway. His plea for an incomes policy may appeal to some of the unions representing the low paid.

But his chances of winning this contest will depend critically on many of those who support Mr Kinnock for leader voting for Mr Hattersley as the deputy leader in the belief that this would be the "dream ticket" that would both satisfy the party and attract the electorate. Yet people of this persuasion will be less likely to vote for Mr Hattersley if they feel that he is distancing himself too far from Mr

How far would be too far? It would be an advantage for Mr Kinnock to have a deputy who clearly came from the other wing of the party: an all-left leadership would make it immeasurably harder to recover the confidence of the general public. But Mr Kinnock's supporters would be worried at the thought of electing a deputy with whom there would be persistent policy clashes.

Already some of his supnervous twinges by Mr Hattersley's manifesto. They have been upset by his reference to "would-be philosophers" at party headquarters during the election campaign - though that gibe should be forgotten soon enough. They think his espousal of an incomes policy inopportune. They resent his criticism that Labour's economic proposals in the election lacked credibility; and they differ with him over disarma-It is the disagreements over economic policy and disarmament that matter most. Mr Kinnock has been at pains to play down the differences between them. That is natural enough: if he is ever to be Prime Minister, Mr Kinnock needs Mr Hattersley at least as much as Mr Hattersley needs the deputy leadership. In his own manifesto Mr Kinnock has removed the point of contention between them by referring to with-drawal as no more than a last resort. He was studiously imprecise in several other areas, but he repeated the commitment to ban American nuclear weapons from Britain. Mr Hattersley could not accept that and be true to his declared beliefs. In publishing bis manifesto he is unlikely, therefore, to have increased his chances of the deputy leadership, because he has

But this is what makes his manifesto significant. The only logical basis for it is that Mr Hattersley has decided to establish the ground on which he intends to conduct his future battles within the party, whether or not as deputy leader. There are some, even among his potential supporters, who have little or no confidence that he will stick to his position. They fear that he will fudge, fudge and fudge again. But if they are right, Mr Hattersley will be making nonsense of his own manifesto.

His decision to publish such a statement at this time makes sense not as a last desperate shot in the leadership contest; nor as an attempt to clinch the deputy leadership, but as the first salvo in the new battle for influence within the party. Whether or not he becomes deputy leader is of less importance than the outcome of that battle. He has staked out a position that would bring Labour more into line with the thinking of the electorate. Unless the party is prepared to move in this direction it will soon become relatively unimportant who holds power in its

Any colour as long as it's black.

Once in a generation or so, a product appears which transcends itself.

A Model T Ford, for example.

The Model T was just a small, cheap car. But for millions of Americans, the flivver meant affordable freedom, a rise in living standards, fun, the American way of life.

And to the world, it was a demonstration of the benefits of mass-production.

The Sinclair ZX computer has a similar status.

It's small, cheap, and (as it happens) black.

For millions of people in Britain it represents fun, a firmer grip on the way the world works, an opportunity to join in what is certain to be the British way of life.

But its differences from the Model T are also instructive. There is art in its making, but even more in its design. It's advanced, clever, the product of a small team, not of a giant manufacturing machine.

In fact, its manufacture has been subcontracted.

Sinclair ZX computers, and the 60-person innovative company which develops them, are as surely the models for the next 20 years in Britain as the Model T was for America.

We must rely on our brains for survival. We must stay light on our feet, quick to adapt, develop, improve. (Three different ZX models have appeared, in three consecutive years.) The key to stability is agility.

It may sound strenuous, and in the next few years it's bound to be so. But when we get it right as a nation, our progress could be almost effortless. The ZX computer concept was so right that within three years, the British public has snapped up a million of them. Britain now has more computers per head than any other country.

Which in itself shows that, given a chance, we take to the future like ducks to water.

From Ian Murray

Sir Geoffrey Howe yesterday spelled out Britain's rescue plan for the bankrupt EEC to other foreign ministers meeting in Brussels. The plan forces cuts in agricultural expenditure and provides a comprehensive "safety net" which would mean that never again would Britain have to pay an unfair share of the cost of running a profligate Community.

According to diplomats, the speech, at a special Council of Ministers meeting called to plan the future financing of the Community, had a "consider-able impact". It will form the basis of Britain's negotiating position in the months to come for reforming the EEC.

It has made it perfectly clear to other member states that Britain will only consider any increase in the Community budget when it is perfectly satisfied the EEC is being run efficiently and fairly.

To make sure it is efficient

Britain will be seeking radical reform of the common agricultural policy. To make sure it is fair it will be insisting on a new mechanism which would regulate budget payments according to the relative wealth of the member states.

The British Government intends issuing detailed papers on both of these subjects before the end of the month, but Sir Geoffrey yesterday told the Council the broad outlines of what is to be suggested.

The first element in farm spending reform would be an upper limit on the rate of growth of spending on the common agricultural policy. This would seek to limit CAP spending as a fixed proportion of the rate of growth of the Community's own resources. This, SirGeoffrey argued, should enshrined in Comm-

Sir Geoffrey pointed out that the regional fund would need twice the size of the total EEC budget if Britain were to receive from it payments equal to the £450m rebate it had been promised this year.

He also showed that the Commission's idea of varying the level of value-added tax budget payments according to a series of wealth criteria would only reduce Britain's net contribution by a quarter.

Britain wants the Community, therefore, to agree that there would be an aggregate upper limit on the net burden which the more prosperous states would be expected to bear of the total Community budget. This would be expressed as a small percentage of the gross domestic product of the mem-

SETTLED AT A PRICE

There are many on me Oppo-sition benches who will seek to: make political capital out of the Government's decision; con-firmed in the House of Commons yesterday by the Prime Minister, to make peace with the Stock Exchange. Conservative governments and the City are natural allies and it always seemed unlikely - if a suitable settlement could be arranged that Ministers would allow the Stock Exchange to be dragged through a long court case defending itself against allegations that not only is it'a monopoly, but it is one which acts against the public interest. The government has now held out an olive branch and asked the Stock Exchange voluntarily to forego some of its more obviously anti-competitive practices in return for dropping the case. It is, in short, offering an out-of-court settlement. However if the government is to avoid the accusation that it has one law for public sector monopolies which are said to be against the public interest, and another

> At the heart of any healthy financial community lies a healthy stock exchange. London is an international financial centre and must remain so. It is therefore very important for the stock exchange to open its windows to international competition. It must tailor its rules to the needs of international commerce in the closing years of the twentieth century which are changing fast from those which bave hitherto conditioned the structure and behaviour of British stockbroking firms. The Stock Exchange may have won its narrow point with the OFT. It must not lose it in the wider world through lack of vision.

SCORCHEFEARTH, SOVIET-STYLE

The Greenpeace environmentalists arrested in Siberia while investigating a whaling station have drawn welcome attention to one aspect of a brooding ecological disaster of global proportions. The Soviet ships which pursued Rainbow Warrior to prevent filmed evidence reaching the outside world were trying to maintain a cover-up o the unprecedented damage done to a sixth of the earth's surface in sixty years of Soviet rule.

This is not the result of my deliberate act of policy, as were the millions of deaths caused bythe purges and famines of the Stalin period. On the contrary, protection of the environment is enshrined in the Soviet constitution and scarcely a day passes without a concerned journalist exposing in the official media some criminal abuse of nature; the perpetrators are severely punished. But all those who live in the USSR, from privileged Politburo to imprisoned poacher, are victims of a system which deliberately stifles debate and suppresses undesirable statistics.

right wrongs judged to have been done to citizens. The suspicion grows that councillors have lost control of the administrative apparatus beneath them, allowing their officials to strut like municipal Prussians. Little wonder that Mrs Thatcher's government can point to deep public resentment at councils to justify its perilous descent into centralization. The Local Ombudsman, despite his Nordic origins, has become a system for compromise and conciliation on familiar Britisl lines. It is a system that councils should cherish, for when the public lose confidence in the ability of ombudsmen or district auditors to remedy bureaucratic heavy-handedness or councillars' partiality the demands forcentral interference will grow. Action is required on two fronts. Under he 1974 Local lished the Commission for Local Administration citizens may not complain directly to the Ombudsman: grievances have to be processed through a councillor. The provision may originally have been well-intended - to discourage frivolous complaints, to promote local settlements by councillors' mediation. But there is now enough evidence that it actively discourages complaints; councillors themselves are often the object of complaint. The time has come for the government to change the rules and allow direct access by the public to the Ombudsman.

Government Act which estab-

The same Act created as a buffer between the Local Ombudsman and councils a representative body comprising senior people from the counties, districts' and cities' associations. This body has proven active and articulate at pointing out where the Ombudsman affronts principles of local autonomy and council independence. But it has been less than forthcoming in pressing councils to accept the Ombudsman's verdict. A serious attempt should be made to impose discipline on those councils which have refused to redress wrongs identified by the Ombudsman. If the councils cannot police themselves then the civil servants and government ministers will.

television to comment on it.

But the wier matter is this. It should have been possible for the main Opposition party to achieve an element of biartisanship with the Government c the day on nuclear policy. Similary, given that nuclear policy involvs large moral and political isses and substantial public expending (although not for cruise), there i much to be said for a thoroughly incrmed public opinion. Instead, sucessive governments have chosen to proceed in secrecy. This has exteded to Parliament and even to Mixsters and has gone far beyond wat prudent security requires.

As Minier of State for Defence, I was intimedly concerned for a short while wh one aspect of the Chevalini programme. But, when answerin questions in the House of Commos, I was instructed to rest on the ap-dating of Polaris which should ot be confused with "a new generapn" of nuclear weapons.

comfortable. They preferred a sotto roce approach to such delicate issues. When I published a pamphlet The when I moved up into the Cabirl decisions on nuclear policy setting out the case for Nato's twin track decision, there was a deafening silence. Mr Roy Hattersley, for one, vanised altogether from view. Any visit 10 Washington with normal was struck durab when asked on access to defence gossip or to an American academic institution that specialised in security and arms control could have learnt what British Members of Parliament were being denied. But MPs must blame themselves. The reluctance of the great majority of Labour MPs to dig deeper into defence matters except to find ammunition to oppose it, is matched by the strong military instinct of many Conservatives who enjoy the cloak-and-dagger approach to defence. As a result, the Select Committee on Defence often succumbed to the blandishments of Ministers who have contrived to divert it from too much probing.

Mr Denis Healey is good for a bit of fun and many people will treasure the memory of a distinguished Secretary of State for Defence standing on his head. But Mr Healey is a transient politician. The informed discussion of how Britain can be properly defended is an enduring concern. Yours faithfully, WILLIAM RODGERS, 48 Patshuli Road, NW5.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

No real signs of economic up-turn

From, Mr Alan Edwards

alleged turn-around of the UK economy is premature.

He correctly states that demand has increased significantly over the past 12 months and is happy to acknowledge that an enormous increase in consumer borrowing has brought this about. He does not go on to question whether this level of borrowing is sustainable.

Net saving has fallen to a record low, while personal debt is at a record high compared with incomes. It is clear that further new borrowing cannot sustain the growth in demand we have seen over the last 12 months, and that some other factor, not yet apparent, must emerge if the recovery is to be

On output, Mr Consdon correctly states that the May industrial output index, is four point up on November. The index, however, is ex-tremely volatile and the latest published CSO industrial output statistics have been revised back to

In the third and fourth quarters of 1982, the monthly figures bobbed around an average of 102.4. The first quarter average in 1983 was 103 hardly a major increase, even if provisional April and May figures have edged up slightly. And this includes oil output. The index of manufacturing output has languished at around 89 since early

The central problem for the economy remains the sterling exchange rate which has not responded appropriately to differeninflation rates since 1979. Sterling remains grossly overvalued by around 20 or 30 per cent. This is why imports have responded so much better than domestic output to higher levels of demand in 1983. (In late 1982, demand was largely satisfied by running down stocks.)

There will not, and cannot be, sustained recovery for the UK economy until this fundamental currency misalignment has been corrected, medium -term financial strategy or not.

Yours etc. ALAN EDWARDS. 82 Perry Street, Billericay,

From Professor Wynne Godley, Sir, Mr Tim Congdon states (feature, July 14) that the Government has "adhered to a medium term financial strategy, that inflation has been reduced as a result and that there is evidence of a sustained recovery". He claims this proves W. R. EYRES, wrong, the 364 economists who 26 Grove-Terrace, NW5. signed a letter in early 1981 stating July 14.

Sir, Mr Congdon's culogy in your bring inflation permanently under columns on July 14 on the current control and thereby induce an automatic recovery in output and employment.

Although the Government has not in fact adhered to its mediumterm financial strategy as set out in the March, 1980, Budget (money supply has grown by around 50 per cent since 1980 as against the 19-33 per cent target range fixed at that time), it is true that demand has been deflated and inflation has come down. But there is no evidence that inflation has been brought permanently under control, let alone that a substantial or sustained improvement in output and employment is under way. No one knows what would happen to inflation if sustained recovery were to occur and unemployment reduced significantly, but there is a fair chance that it would accelerate again.

Such growth as is now occurring. induced by the removal of HP controls last July as well as higher mortgage lending and stockbuilding. is not yet fast enough to stop unemployment rising although it has already wiped out our large current account surplus. An expansion based only on personal borrowing and stockbuilding is inherently unsustainable, and unless our international competitiveness improves dramatically it will fairly

Juo 19190 IIOOS Nothing has happened since 1981 to cause me to change the view I expressed then, nor I suspect would the other 363 economists wish to alter their statement.

Yours faithfully, WYNNE GODLEY, Director, Department of Applied Economics, University of Cambridge, Sidgwick Avenue, Cambridge

From Mr W. R. Eyres Sir. Might one suggest that Tim Congdon (feature, July 14) has mistaken the half-time whistle for the end of the match?

Far from there having been a spontaneous recovery in personal borrowing, this was actively encouraged by the ending of hire-purchase controls last August and by the budget proposal to increase mort-gage subsidies. The money supply has been allowed to breach its target by a wide margin, so it is hardly possible to argue that the so-called medium term financial strategy is intact, unless it was simply "stopgo" in other clothing.
It is thus too early to cheer from

Forensic evidence

From Sir David Napley

Sir, Mr Mayhew, in answer to a parliamentary question put by Dr Summerskill on May 9, said: It is already the practice for the results of examinations by Home Office forensic science laboratories to be made available both to the prosecution and the defence. In addition, arrangements exist whereby the services of the laboratories are made available via the police for the examination of specimens on behalf of the defence. The results of such examinations are also made known to

The last sentence of this answer is incorrect. The results of such examinations are not made available to both sides. The remainder of the answer may give a wholly misleading impression.

The practice of the Government laboratories, about which many of us have protested over many years without avail (and I write as the Director and Past President of the British Academy of Forensic Sciences, although not on their behalf) is that if a laboratory has expressed an opinion on specimens submitted by the police, none of its experts is permitted to assist the defence, either generally or by examining further specimens or re-examining the original ones.

Orchid survival

From Professor K. Jones Sir, I have read with interest the recent correspondence in The Times on the protection of rare and endangered orchids in the British Isles and would like to set the record straight on several of the points

First of all, to say that Orchis militaris and other species are on the extreme of their ranges in this country and thus probably "on the way out" (Mr L. R. Lewis, June 18) is questionable and an oversimplification. Records show clearly that most of the endangered species including O. militaris were once quite widespread in the country. The range for example of the Lady's Slipper orchid once extended from Derbyshire north to Cumbria and

Durham, Destruction of habitat is the main cause of their decline here. Those plants that survive are, for the most part, as vigorous as any seen abroad so that any suggestion that British plants might be a poor representative of their European counterparts

The suggestion that seeds of rare species be introduced from European plants of endangered species such as Cypripedium calceolus and Orchis militaris (Dr Kenneth Marsh, June 23) is, in our view, premature. Seed of these and of other endangered species from British plants is perfectly viable. We now possess the technology to grow plants from seed and to reintroduce them to the wild if necessary (see New Science (1983) vol 198: 540).

A programme with this in view and with the cooperation of the Nature Conservancy Council is currently being undertaken by scientists at Kew. We thereby hope to preserve the integrity of the wild British stocks of rare orchids and to considerably improve their chances of survival on a more healthy basis than at present.

The work of various county naturalist trusts and other wildlife groups in protecting the orchids that remain will then be seen as the vital first step in the rehabilitation process now becoming available. Yours faithfully, KEITH JONES, Deputy Director, Royal Botanic Gardens,

Richmond.

Record of the Red Cross in Thailand

From the Count de Salis

Sir, The article by William Shawcross ("On a frontier of despair".

June 27) should be welcomed in that it draws attention to the continuing ragedy of Indochina. This can only help to dispel the sad phenomenon of "compassion fatigue" in the international community.

That said, the article also contained allegations against "inadequate relief agencies" of which the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was one. Having just returned after over two years as head of the ICRC delegation in Thailand, I would be grateful for the opportunity of pointing out certain areas where Mr Shawcross's opinions do not accord with the facts.

It is first of all surprising that, while the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and ICRC are singled out for attention, no mention whatsoever is made of the United Nations Border Relief Operation (UNBRO) - by far the largest relief agency active on the Thai/Cambodian border and responsible for co-ordinating the efforts of numerous private voluntary agencies - with which ICRC has consistently worked in close co-operation.

Secondly, as a generalisation, only governments can "give protection" international organisations can only plead for it on behalf of others. In answer, therefore, to the "anguished petitions" (and since some of them were addressed to me personally I can vouch that they were) all that an international organisation can do is to negotiate with the governments concerned. It should surprise nobody that the details of such negotiations are of necessity confidential: few governments would negotiate on any other basis!

Since January this year, about 90,000 of the 200,000 people at the border have been displaced by fighting in three major incidents. Nong Chan beginning January 31, Phnom Chat/Kok Tahan beginning March 31 and O'smack in early April. On each of these occasions Thailand allowed the refugees to seek temporary safety on condition that they would be returned to the border.

The human cost of these disasters in terms of dead will never accurately be known, but ICRC has treated some 1,500 emergency cases (a British Red Cross surgical team performed outstandingly, coping with up to 100 wounded in a day) and thousands of more lightly wounded were treated by ICRC and voluntary agencies at dressing stations and hospitals in the field. Hundreds of separated families were subsequently re-united by the ICRC tracing agency:

In fairness to my colleagues, three-quarters of whom are Thai, it might be added that they were under fire with the refugees and it was on that basis that the "request" to allow them to cross into Thailand was granted after three days on the first incident, and within 24 hours on the two subsequent ones. The lives saved by Thailand's merciful decision, following these negotiations, are quite as valuable as those saved by surgery after injury.

At "Red Hill", which was the evacuation site in Thailand following the second of the three major clashes, Mr Shawcross writes that for several weeks both ICRC and UNHCR dithered and neglected to confront the Thai Government on this issue." Did we? I doubt whether the Royal Thai Government would

"Confrontation" may not have been the preferred negotiating stance, but negotiations were immediate, continuous, with frequent oral and written representations made at the highest level, and were instrumental in securing freedom of choice for the 2.700 who were able to avoid returning to a Khmer Rouge area in spite of the fact that one of the refugees quoted by Mr Shawcross said "the Khmer

Rouge soldiers will make them." Further, the date for the move back to the border on 24/25 May was agreed well in advance with the Thai authorities, and the Army was instrumental in assuring that freedom of choice to return to a non-Khmer Rouge area would not be interfered with by armed elements. I do not of course claim, suggest or imply that ICRC is blameless, but the only fair test of any relief action by an international organisation (and much else besides) is not "Was the underlying political problem solved, and all suffering abolished?" but rather "Was everything that could be done to relieve suffering done, as well as humanly possible. with the resources available heartbreaking fact that ICRC being essentially concerned with the victims of armed conflicts, is more directly concerned operationally with the relief of suffering rather than its abolition.

Mr Shawcross's allegation that "some international organisations" (and since only two are mentioned it is reasonable to assume that ICRC is one of them) "have reason to feel ashamed of their current policies" is a very grave one, and, if it is well founded, I should be grateful to know in what respect.

If, as I contend, it is not, then it may be that it is some journalist who has better reason to feel ashamed. I am, Sir, yours faithfully, inherent in such a venture.

From Mr Eric Moonman Sir. In discussing the problem of editorial control of a putative Labour daily newspaper, Bernard Levin (feature, July 4) is raising but one of the complex questions

Practical management sense with regard to newspaper production suggests that a more serious issue is whether the "ownership" would have the confidence, let alone the capital, for the initial launch and the capacity, running into millions of pounds, to sustain and exploit a market in a very tough, competitive industry.

The long history of Labour newspaper ventures has been dismal. Even the party's official publication, the well-edited Labour Wcekly, is unable to increase its sales beyond 20,000 copies, which shows quite graphically the difficulty in relying on Labour Party supporters to sustain a publication.

There is no "natural Labour reader" and if there were, he or she s quite likely to be reading the Daily Express (for its sports coverage) or the Daily Mirror or the Sun (for the hell of it). This is why the Labour Party's National Executive Subcommittee on the Media, of which I was a member, did not regard a national paper as a priority and, therefore, why all reference to it was deleted from the manifesto.

The committee's thrust was to urge resources towards the setting up of a launch fund to assist new publications, with particular emphasis on local, regional and specialist

The odd feature about the current debate, centred on Lord McCarthy's report, is that the evidence he presents on costings is extremely thin; nor has the information been extrapolated on a significant scale. The enquiry also fails to say how trade union practices in the print would be any more favourable to a Labour daily paper than they are currently for the Financial Times. Yours faithfully, ERIC MOONMAN,

UN Water Decade

From Mr G. Arthur Brown

Sir, Tony Samstag's article in your July 13 issue claiming that the UN Water Decade has been abandoned recalled Mark Twain's comment following the premature appearance of his obituary.

As chairman of the Decade's Steering Committee for Cooperative Action, I can assure you that the UN has not abandoned, and will not abandon, the universal mandate voted by its General Assembly in 1980 to make every effort towards providing water and sanitation for as many people as possible during the 1980s. Yours sincerely,

G. ARTHUR BROWN,

July 14.

From Mr David Simons Sir. In his Parliamentary written reply, Lord Elton states that wheel clamping of diplomatic cars is to be discontinued because legal advice suggests that the practice contravenes the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. This is all very well, but it would not go amiss were the diplomatic community (particularly the junior staff, some of whom blatantly ignore parking regulations) to be reminded that the same Vienna Convention states under Article 4(1) that "... it is the duty of all persons enjoying . . . privileges and immunities to respect the laws and regulations of the receiving State".

Also, in the view of the general public, the question of illegal diplomatic car parking epitomises the entire range of diplomatic privileges and immunities. Thus, the constant abuse of these privileges is arguably bringing the whole system into disrepute. Yours faithfully.

Over-tired?

From Mr Fritz Spiegl. Sir. Mr Philip Howard (July 13) may agree with my suggestion that knackers" probably sprang from the Persian and Arabic naggara. which were small drums strapped to the loins. They came to Britain in the middle ages (variously described as nakers, nakeres or nakeren). The larger usually hung on the left, as with all higher/lower instrumental juxta positions, (except, for some curious reason, mounted kettle-drums in the British Army). Nakers are mentioned in Chaucer and depicted in the Luttrell Psalter (and, by the way, do not rhyme with "acres", as nervous Radio 3 usage has tried to establish). Might not a medieval percussionist engaging over-energetically in such inguinal drumming have felt literally knackered in the modern colloquial sense?

MI DAVID WARD

Mr David Ward, BE, who died in Dunedin, Ne Zealand, on July 16 at the age f 61, was a notable Scottish opatic bass who was equally impassive in Wagnerian roles and I Verdi. Born in Dumbarts he was educated at St Patrice School, Dumbarton, and serid during the war in the Royal avy from 1940 to 1943 and susquently in the Royal Indian avy from 1943 to 1946.

He studied at a Royal College of Music as later at Munich with Han Hotter, subsequently joining to Chorus of Sadler's Wells Open in 1952. He was to stay at Sadl's Wells for six years, singing in that time a variety of roles ginning with the Old Bart's Boughton's The Immortation in 1952. His entry intelligence began with the compar and he sang the title role in The Flying Dutchman. 1943 to 1946.

ogist. He obtained the DPH and DTM & H diplomas in 1919 and 1920 respectively.

From 1925 to 1930 he was Director of Pathology to the Royal Ar Force and for the greater part of the same period he also acted as a lecturer in biochemistry at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine. During his subsequent career in the Royal Air Force he held in succession the posts of consultant in pathology and tropical medicine (1930-35), officer commanding Contral Medical Establishment (1934-39), consultant in hygiene, pathology and tropical medicine (1935-39).

At the outbreak of the Second World War he was appointed director of hygiene at the Air Ministry, and in 1941 he became Director-General of Medical Services. He was chief executive officer of the Flying Personnel Research Committee from 1939-41 and was later chairman of the committee.

Among other honours which he received were the John Jeffries Award of the Institute of 1973. Aeronantical Sciences of the Harold Edward Whiteham USA in 1944. The LLD was born on October 1887; Glasgow (hon causa) was the second son of Edward, conferred upon him in 1943.

When Solti did the complete Ring cycle at Covent Garden in 1964 Ward sang Wotan and this was one of the roles in which he was to perform with great sociaim. King Mark in Tristan and Isolde was another of his

But Ward did not like to think of himself specifically as a Wigner singer. In 1960 he had sung Lord Walton in I Puritani at Glyndebourne and his roles at Covent Garden included Arkel in Pelleas et Mclisande and Pope Clement in Benvenuto Cellini. His Boris Godunov for the Scottish opera was highly thought of and he was also a natural Verdi singer, Zaccaria in Nabucco being one of his favourite roles.

After he left Covent Garden he sang in Europe and the United States, as well as South America where he did the Ring in Buenos Aires. In 1979 he settled in Otago in New Zealand but continued to travel to America for several months a year for singing engagements.

Ward had a voice of great roles including that of Prosus range and beauty, together with an innate dramatic sense which lent a deeply moving quality to many of his roles.

THE TIMES WEDNESDAY JULY 20 1983

THE ARTS

The biennial Moscow International Film Festival, the major socialist cultural event of its kind, is currently in progress, boasting two hundred films and a thousand guests from 104 countries. It is the only major international film festival which is not covered on this page, only because Moscow has since 1971 declined to invite The Times' successive critics. The festival's slogan, for humanism in cinema art, for peace and friendship among nations", does not extend to every Tom, Dick or Harry. Moscow runs a tight ship and takes no risks of rocking it.

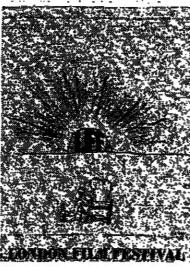

The same applies to the choice of films. Local Hero was rejected presumably because it depicts a sociable Soviet seaman who fraternizes and trades unofficially with Bill Forsyth's Scots. The Moscow selectors clearly feel easier - in terms of humanism - with films like America - From Hitler to MX and Ecocide - Strategy of War, which represent the United States in the shorts section of the festival.

Moscow's firmly exercised veto on entries is one of the reasons why the British Film and Television Producers' Association, which is normally responsible for British festival participation, is no longer officially represented - though they stress officially represented - though they stress that they do not discourage their members from entering films. This disregard has evidently been disappointing to the Moscow organizers, who set great store by what they see as "official" national representation; and they are clearly consoled this year by having both the consoled this year by having both the Chairman and the Director of the British Film Institute as guests for the first time, It is significant that in its press reports Moscow stresses Sir Richard Attenborough's presence in his role as the BFI Chairman, rather than as the director of Gandhi, which is being shown hors

This is not the only diplomatic coup for Moscow. For the first time in years there is an official United States delegation, led by Jack Valenti, President of the Motion Picture Association of America. The People's Republic of China is present, as they say officially, "after a considerable interval". The Philippines are participating for the first time. Those of us who are not on Moscow's visiting list need not be too dispirited however. July offers a choice of alternative festivals - at Auckland, NZ, Edmonton (Canada), Giffone Valle Piana, Gijon, Odense, Oviedo, Philadelphia, Salerno, Sontander, Taormina, Trieste and Wellingion, NZ, not to speak of Hiroshima where there is a festival for shorts which manifest effort towards peace and reverence for life's. There may be others; these at least are listed in the new International Film Festivals Directory 1983-4, published by the British Film Institute and the British Council and obtainable from the BFI for July is not by any means the busiest time. Festivals tend to cluster at the extremes of the tourist season, when resorts like Cannes, Biarritz, San Sebastian or Venice welcome the extra boost to the hotel trade. Altogether the Directory lists around two hundred festivals. Since their average length exceeds a week on the most conservative estimate there are 48 months of festivals in any one year.

The self-appointed regulating body for film festivals, the International Film Producers' Association (FIAPF), recognizes only 37 of the festivals. "Recognition" depends on paying the Association's annual subscription - which exceeds the total income of many of the smaller events. In exchange FIAPF imposes its regulations (involving length and timing of the festival, qualifications of entries and so on) and organizes the calendar so that dates do not clash. In this it is not always successful: there has been a running bettle for the best January dates between Manila and New Delhi, for instance.

Cannes, Venice, Berlin and Manila (The festival that alternates between Moscow and Karlovy Vary is apparently not affiliated to FIAPF, presumably because it is not able to conform to the regulations regarding selection.) The multiple functions of these "A" festivals are self-apparational or the self-apparation of the self-apparat ent. They are the major international showplaces, both as competition and market, for new film product; and invaluable meeting-places for film people of every kind — merchanis, directors, writers, actors, critics, journalists. There is no more swift and effective means of launching a new film, name or talent than a successful showing in Cannes or Venice. If a little less dramatically than an Oscar, a Cannes prize can considerably enhance the price of a film or artist.

For film-makers prepared to set their sights a little lower, there are plenty of other prizes to be had, as the trophies on the walls of most producers' offices show. Three-quarters of the world's festivals award prizes, with a regular gilded bestiary on offer the Venice Lion, the Berlin Bear, the Locarno Leopard, the Indian Elephant the Giffone Griffon and Golden Squirrels at both Amsterdam and Cortina India offers Peacocks, Manila, Eagles, and vely compete for Globes, Anchors, Wheatears, Shells, Roses and Golden Nymphs. The only prize dedicated to a human figure is the Charlie Chaplin Grand Prix of the Gabrovo Festival in Bulgaria. A Golden Cane is the appropriate award at the Festival of Comedy Films held in August in Chaplin's last home-town of

It is reasonable to ask if prizes are not devalued by their sheer abundance. The cynical festival habitué may answer few awards have ever rated much higher than the fairy on the Christmas tree. Even the great festival prizes are sometimes of questionable significance for the more knowing too often they seem to be awarded not for merit but to effect neutral political compromises between irreconcilable factions of the jury. The honour-rolls of Cannes, Venice and Berlin are in consequence full of titles no one any more remembers: this year's winner of the Cannes Palme d'Or, The Ballad of Narayama, for instance, seems unlikely to be commemorated in the history books.

The value of festival prizes can be reckoned in terms of morale, prestige and commerce. Any prize must be a boost to the recipient's morale. Reward and applause are a thrill, even in the smallest pool. In terms of prestige, too, there is no question of the value of awards at the major festivals, as well as at a few of the best-established second-league events like Locarno, Taormina, San Sebastian, Chicago or such a festival as Mannheim, which exists to show and promote the work of new directors. A lot of the rest may look good on the shelf, but would hardly even justify the cost and trouble of announcing the honour in publicity for the recipient film. A prize at Venice, Locarno or Chicago might make a potential distibutor look at a new film with more curiosity, but it is unlikely to add a dollar to the advance he will offer. Especially for impoverished independent film-makers, money prizes are a lot more attractive than all the glittery flora and fauna. The major money prize offered by a British festival is the Tyneside Award of £5,000 given at the Tyneside Festival in October, and substantial enough to launch in independent director on a new project.

While the great "A" festivals are primarily for the professionals, and the East European festivals have their own diplomatic purposes, other important festivals are clearly intended more for their local audiences. Events like London, Edinburgh, Montreal, Toronto, Sydney, Melbourne and Los Angeles define themselves as "festivals of festivals", picking up the best of the past year's selection from the major competitive events. A few, like Chicago, which as non-subscribers are not restricted by FIAPF regulations to the contrary, combine this sort of selective reprise with prizes. Inevitably each year produces a sort of touring rep of festival favourites, so that the programme booklets of Sydney. London, Chicago and Toronto have by and large a strong family likeness.

Many of the smaller festivals justify their survival by specialization. In this country Cambridge has an animation festival and Tyneside shows only independent films that are adjudged to attempt new directions

To the uninitiated, the endless festival circuit from Delhi in January to Huescu (short films) in December may sound like fun. In fact it can be a punishing and frustrating trek for the journalist who is not selective enough about his festivals, and is faced with the problem of writing about films he has already reported from several festivals before, or others which his readers are never likely to see or want to sec. This is why the critic of The Daily Telegraph still whimsically talks of organizing a restful fortnight for the London critics at a desirable resort which has no festival. The idea is that we should lie on the beach, coordinating our stories; and then send back sturing reviews of esoteric films of our own imagining to entertain our readers. It could be a lot more enjoyable for all parties than

BBCI and Central Television spent an hour and threequarters between them last night demolishing the romantic notion of the war correspondent as an inveterate seeker after truth even in the cannon's mouth. David Jessel's Trumpets and Typewriters (BBC1) which might in view of its content, have been called "Strumpets and Typewriters" gave us a bare 15 minutes out of the foxbole before we were being addressed in Frontline (Central) on governmental and press mendacity by John Pilger, whose appearance and lugubrioverlap in pictures and information. Both programmes paid tribute to William Howard patches in this paper (which made it to London rather quicker than dispatches would from the Falklands) earned him the title of "miserable scribbler" from Prince Albert and who, in relation to war correspondents, both gave it a good mention,

It was the Somme, where 20,000 Britons died in a day, that damaged press credibility forever, said Mr Jessel. Small losses were reported but casualty lists gave the lie. In that war, correspondents did what they were told and Earl Haig gave a representative group' Union Jacks at the end of it and That does not happen often to the historian Dr Noble Frankland thought there was little the press could do about the bungling. Sir Tom Hopkinson, former editor of Picture Post, spoke of his view after Dunkirk:

"I realized at that moment that my task as an editor was not to tell the British public the truth". Cyril Ray, who reported for the Manchester Guardian, de-scribed how after Dunkirk British troops threw their rifles away and thought "the buggers will be here tomorrow". The press turned disaster into miracle in obeisance to the government view that the public would not have been able

It was a bad night for myths.

The dambusters' raid was seen as futile as the Charge of the Light Brigade, and both programmes agreed that, in war, truth is suspended by agreement between government and press. Mr Pilger quoted the veteran American journalist L. G. Stone "All governments are liars and nothing they say should be believed" - and asked if there was not something in it.

So much for a sad craft. Mr Jessel, in rather less time than Mr Pilger, shaded it, though in his script there was that echo of the philistine - standing afar off and thanking the lord that he is not like other men - which too often creeps into television retailing of the sins of the press.

His demonstrations, with bread and pennies, of what happens to money and produce would have made a popular economics book to rival Veblen but sit stodgily uncooked in the middle of the novel. With Stephen Lowe's cutting or recasting, they make effective theatre in the hands of David Fielder's Owen, tensely under-played in Toulouse-Lautrec spectacles and beard.

That interchange is itself a major point - they also don humps and bellies for faithfully crude portrayal of the munici pal council traders dammed on appearance by names like Didlum and Grinder. The belief that selfishness stems from an unsocialist society is implied by the conclusion, just as faithful to the novel which originally ended with a vision of glory from the "risen sun of social-ism". And their a cappella rendering of "Work, for the night is coming" carries the Tressell message that death, on their present terms, is hardly something to fear.

Mitsuko Uchida Bishopsgate Hall

Bach was a commanding point of departure for the first of the five daily lunchtime concerts being given this week by Misuko Uchida as part of the City of London Festival. The Japanese pianist, now based in London, is making Schubert a constant feature in each proconstant feature in each pro-gramme, the others in turn pairing him with Haydn, Beethoven, Bartok and Schoenberg. Monday's choice of works had a subtle balance of contrast between dynamic tension and relaxed intimacy.

For the A minor English Suite of Bach, the pianist adopted a Busoni-like approach to the opening Prelude and concluding Gigue, their weight, speed and sonority framing an altogether lighter character for the movements between In neither of these outer movements was the contrapuntal texture given the crystalline clarity which can be so distincwas it woven into a controlled density on a larger and more assertive scale.

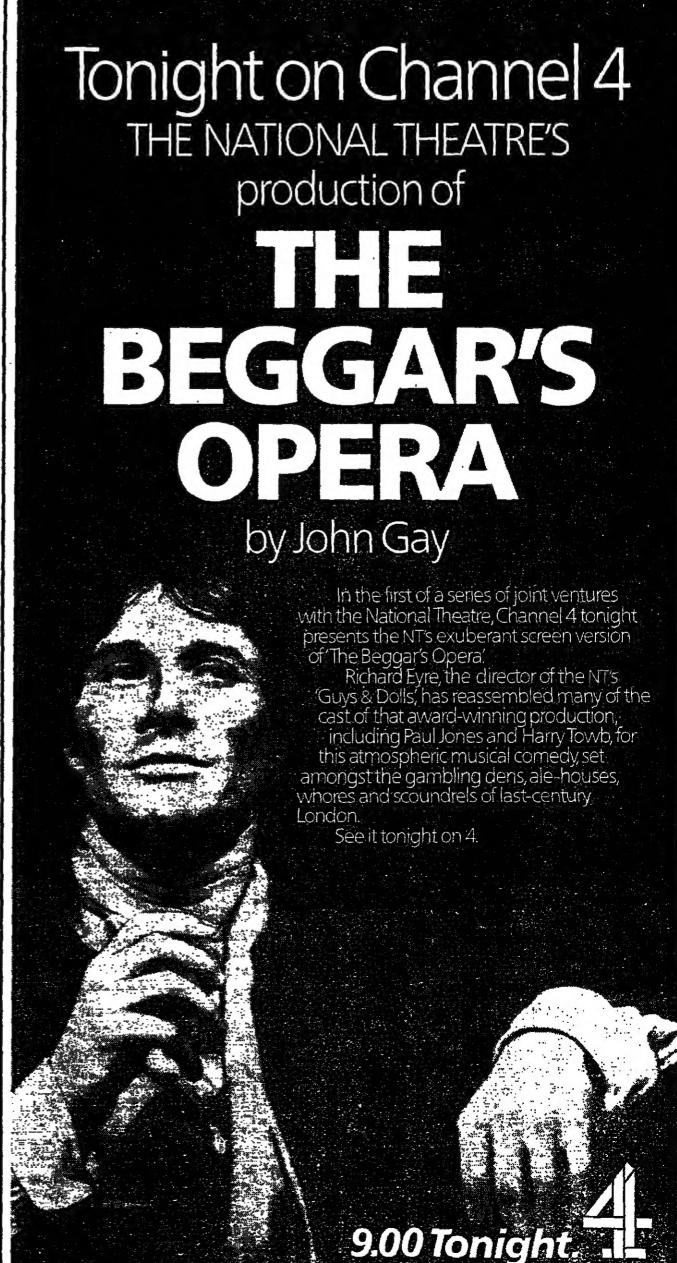

The other dance movements were attractively varied, the part-writing in the Allemande emerging as a fanciful interplay and the usually stately Sara bande becoming softer and more flexible in its phrasing Miss Uchida adorned this and other movements with a modest degree of ornament, but in the two Bourrées her lively rhyth mic impetus sometimes brought an imbalance between high and low registers.

Her left hand packed a hefty punch from the elbow, and this imparted a large-scale effect to the first of Schubert's Four Impromptus, D899, making it a melancholy march with an intensity comparable to the fimeral march movement in Chopin. In the following E flat Impromptu the skimming brilliance of the piano's scale passages alternated with almost exclamatory punctication to achieve sustained tension.

The remaining two pieces this set were more relaxed, that in G flat having suitably romantic expression without becoming over-sentimental and the popular A flat Imprompts contrasting a life-asserting joy-ousness in its numbling supeg-gios with a dreamy wistfulness as the more lyrical moments

Is Lex Service, the distributor in Britain of Volvo cars, about to take over Avon Rubber, the troubled tyre manufacturer? The market last night considered that a cash and share alternative bid was on the way as shares of Avon Rubber bounced 4p to a new high of

The formation of ICI Speciality Chemicals - in all but a separate stock issue, a new company with its own board identifies the approach that the "new ICI" is being asked to take since Mr John Harvey-Jones took over as chairman in April last year.

"Eighteen months ago, we would have been tempted to call it a new division," Dr Brian Smith, an ICI main board director, said.

However, the opportunities to set up in new sectors along traditional lines, with value being added to bulk commodities, have disappeared. "The ICI style has been changed," Dr Smith said and added: "The new group's remit is to go hunting.

Essentially, it will not unveil packaged end-products, but will use its considerable research and development resources to solve customer problems in a wide range of industries: from sircraft to toothpaste manufac-in one of the fast-growing chemicals sectors, ICI has created one of the world's biggest speciality operations.

By grouping existing interests

New ICI group aims at £500m sales

"We are already considerably yesterday announced a new bigger an many dedicated business group in speciality speciality chemicals firms," Mr chemicals with annual sales of Brian Killner, managing director, said.

The main units are being drawn from ICI Americas Inc.
Atlas Chemicals in Europe and the UK, the speciality chemicals businesses of its UK Organics Division. The emphasis will be put on developing more sales within the existing sales network. Two-thirds at present, in the US, with the rest mainly in Europe, Work on the new group has been going on for more than a year. And in that time we have had more takeovers than in the past 10 years," Dr Smith said.

"In the United States in particular, you have to be opportunistic. There is not a week that a offer does not come across my desk from there - and you have to give a week's notice that you are either in or out of the bidding." The takeover of the dyestuffs and pigments operations of the

is a perfect example of what ICI will now be looking for, bulking its products range in that sector from 65 to 90 per cent of what is now on the market, adding French West African countries to its marketing network, and increasing annual turnover by 50 per cent to £300m in the process, to make it the fourth largest producer in the world.

Free trade cry on the battlements

City Editor's Comment

Sheer frustration was clearly the keynote of the conference on protectionism organized by the Trade Policy Research Centre last weekend in Kent. Behind closed doors, safely cocooned by the most of safely Leeds Castle, a group of 43 high-ranking politicians, economists and businessmen from around the world said all the right things about the benefits of free trade and the need to translate the fine words of Williamsburg into action.

But on the other side of the drawbridge, thousands of pressure groups are still crying "save our jobs" as Mr Ken Durham, chairman of Unilever and the Research Centre admitted.

And outside the conference, several of the delegates were themselves in the process of discussing new quotas, stitching up bilateral deals or explaining that they could do nothing about the latest impositions on trade. Mr Durham, in his post-conference statement, got to the heart of the matter. "Working through sectoral ministries, those of agriculture and industry, and even ministries of trade, sectional interests are effectively organized to block the liberalization that is in the interests of the economy as a whole".

Yet at the very moment Mr Durham was conclu ding his statement, Mr William Brock, the US special trade representative, who had attended the conference with Mr Paul Channon, Britain's trade minister, was starting a meeting with Mr Channon's boss, Mr Cecil Parkinson. Subjects included the latest US controls on steel imports, the US Export Administration Act. unitary taxation and various other areas of British interest in the benefits of free trade and the free world friction caused by protection and its euphemisms, to take a larger role for the general good. Yet it was the heads of government who agreed at Williamshura to belt new liamsburg to halt new protection and their declaration has so far served only to undermine their own credibility.

Questions for TKM

Yesterday was also exquisitely frustrating for fans of shareholder democracy. The first line of Sir Prichard's annual chairman's review for Tozer Kemsley & Millbourn reads: "the year 1982 was disastrous for shareholder's question at the annual meeting with the thoughts that the meeting was not the place to discuss TKM's problems, which include a £6m loss, extraordinary charges of £20m and no dividend,

Life is invidious for a new chairman facing shareholders critical of actions for which he disclaims responsibility. But the question remains: where else is the ordinary shareholder to receive straight answers? Sir Montague admist his salary of £50,000, less than his predecessor, was agreed by the comapny's ceditor banks. Do not shareholders have a right to know the arrangements agreed with those banks over TKM's £100m of debt? And there is some justification for sharebolder anger at a new share option scheme that allows directors to buy shares, any time over the next three years at a price fixed today. The present depressed price of 33p, a shareholder pointed out, was due to actions of directors in the first place. Sir Montague defends this incentive for the directors to produce results that will push all members' shares higher. Let us hope they succeed.

Shares up as volume improves

New York (AP-Dow Jones) -Wall Street was firm in moderate trading yesterday as the early Dow Jones industrial average rose about nine points to 1198. Gains outnumbered declines by 860 to 500. Mr Alfred Harris, research director at Stifel Nicolaus said: "Today's market reflects a bit of clearing of the air with the Fed" This involved concern about higher interest rates which, he said, probably would not rise much further. He also noted that the improvement in bonds was carrying over into stocks and volume was somewhat better than Monday. Mr Harris expected the market to remain around its present level for "quite some period of time". He said that while the economy had picked up much of this had been discounted by the market.

Lockheed was trading at 114 1/4 up 3, General Dynamics was 52 up 1, Boeing was 44 up 1/4, McDonnell Douglas was 55 up 1/4 and United Technologies was down 1/4 to 69. United Brands was up 7/8 to 23 1/2. Technology issues showing gains included IBM 121 1/8 up

The large and impressive entry for the 103rd AAA championships at Crystal Palace this weekend will be overshadowed if the world championship selectors' pre-varication forces Steve Cram and Graham Williamson into a confrontation with Sebastian Coe in a race that is not even part of those championships. It is still unclear why Williamson and Cram were originally chosen to accompany Steve Ovett in the Heisinki 1500 metres, and then dropped. But it is abundantly clear that no one concerned with the selection changes, under whatever pressure, can emerge with any credit or dignity from the farrage.

Williamson, and now Cram after his impressive win in Nice two nights ago, have a better case for 1500 metres selection than Coe, who has already been selected for 800 metres in Helsinki. But the move suggested to Coe and Williamson by Andy Norman, the England team manager and selector, at

Devon's cream finish on top

Surrey should still be in trophy hunt

THE TIMES WEDNESDAY JULY 20 1983

The finalists from last year's NatWest Trophy meet again today texpecting, no doubt, to stage a better game than they managed then. Neither Surrey nor Warwickshire are thought likely – at least by the bookmakers – to come remotely hear getting so far this time. Those who like their knockout stuff laced with frenzy will not be altogether unhappy at that.

It is somewhat surprising to see that Surrey, the holders, will be aiming for their fifth final in successive years, be it in this competition or the Benson and surveys is in the air or,

Other sides are also out for revenge, Kent particularly. Two weeks ago Essex thrashed them by nine wickets in the Benson and Hedges semi-finals and a year ago, at the same stage in this competition, won by 130 runs. The interval, by which time Yorkshire had creaked to 41, gave little sign of disturbing Boycott's concentration, but an unscheduled interruption for bad light half an hour afterwards may have helped Kent remove the major obstacle in their nath.

Four overs after the return, Boycott made a rare misjudgment giving himself room to hit Johnson through the off side. The off break followed him, turning and keeping low to hit middle and off. A hush hung over Abbeydale Park. The crowd quite reasonably assumed, in view of recent evidence, that with him went Yorkshire's hopes.

Three under par where he had been four under in the opening round, Green met with little resistance from Ross Fraser, a former Scottish Boy's stroke play champion. The Walker Cup captain's little pitches and chips were lethal while Fraser ruined his chances with a host of wild tee shots. Yesterday it was the turn of Colin Cuthbert to have a hole in one. However, as happened to Mike McLaren who made the first, Cuthbert failed to win, his ace at the north metely enabling him to keep going till the 13th against Tom Cochrane of Dunnikier Park.

Smith wins on 'replica of old Mattie Brown'

Harvey Smith, who had an untypical fall here on the opening night, gained an impressive victory in yesterday's Lancome Stakes at unstairs too."
The Horse and Hound Cup on Monday night went to Malcolm Pyrah on Towerlands Anglezarke, giving Pyrah his second win of the the Royal International Horse Show, riding the nine-year-old Sanyo Galaxy whom he bought from Albert Voorn, the Dutch giving Pyrah his second win of the day. Only three horses from 45 trasters reached the jump-off and none of those three produced a second clear round. John Whitaker, the first to go on Ryan's Son, had four faults in 40.93 seconds. Pyrah also knocked a fence down but had the quicker time of 39.83 seconds.

Whitaker proves that youth is no handicap when chasing success

One year ago today — on the Wednesday of the Royal International Horse Show — Michael Whitaker rode one of the most daring rounds of his showjumping career to win the coveted King George V Cup. In so doing he pushed the European champion, Paul Schockemohle, and the world champion, Norberty Koof, into second and third places.

That was at Wembley. Tonight, riding the same horse, Disney Way, at the White City Whitaker defends that tile. His chances of success look good. The Yorkshireman aged 23, is steadily proving that in international showjumping his relative youth — Smith, Broome and Pyrah are 20 years older — is no disadvantage.

Nor is his amateur status, "Next year's Olympics are my sim,"

This year the partnership have represented Britain in two Nations Cut events and have performed well. At Barcelona in May, they gained two clear rounds and helped secure the cup for Britain. A month later, at Aachen, one of the toughest courses, they had only four faults over two rounds. The Olympic build-up continues in Dublin next month where the pair will again

His parents, Enid. and Donald, ran a riding school. All four boys rode and Mra Whitaker spent most weekends taking them to local shows. Michael was competing at five. His schooldays at Salendine Nook. Comprehensive, Huddersfield, were not memorable and he left at 16 with no academic qualifications. He did, however, shine on the sports field and played rugby for Huddersfield juniors at 14.

Whitaker: loves speed

Early showjumping training came with the Rockwood Hunt Pony Club, Michael was a member of their inter-branch team. His intention to become a showjumper was never scriously questioned except for a brief flirtation with national hunt racing at the age of 13. "I think it was the speed that attracted me", he recalls. He has put his love of speed to good effect in the show ring. To watch him against the clock another fillip. Last week it was is to see speed jumping at its finest.

Hooligan waylays fleet on a long and taxing day

Geoff Hodshon, crewed by his nephew, Michael, narrowly won the third race of the Waylarer world championship at Hayling Island yesterday. For three rounds of the course, in a light and sometimes fluctuating breeze, he had first to light his way to the head of the fleet and then, on the final round, to defend his lead from those he had dispossessed.

After what must have been a long taxing race the Hodshons crossed the finishing line a few lengths ahead of Trevor Rose and Tim Kirby in Senta. Both the Hodshons and Rose were well-placed the previous day and both improved their standings by one place as a result of the disqualification of Devon Pickle (Jonathan Townsend) after a wey, And, soon after they finished, the breeze all but disappeared, so that by the time they returned to the Hayling Island Sailing Club most boats had been afloat for about eight hours.

indicated that Grundy would be very good. In the intervening years no horse even bordering his class has emerged from the race with credit but this year there is ground for thinking that it could turn out to be a useful barometer once again.

When I was in Kentucky attending the Keeneland yearling sales 12 months ago I wrote that Michael Goodbody had just bought what I thought was arguably the nicest, though not the most expensive colt, in the sale. Soon afterwards a veterin-ary friend remarked that he would not be surprised if the horse in question never even saw a racecourse! Such is the wide divergence of opinion in racing.

I had taken an interest in the colt in the first place simply because he was the result of a mating planned by my host, Robin Scully, on his Covelly Farm. Unfortunately for Mr Scully he had decided to sell Unity, the dam of the colt, two years earlier when she was in foal to Roberto. Subsequently

Geoff Huffer thinks he has the answer to next week's Extel Handicap at Goodwood in Holmbury, who has recovered from his rough race in the Derby and won gamely at Folkestone yesterday, Holmbury beat Jet Sioux, a 33-1 outsider, by half a length in the Ham Street Maiden Stakes, after which Huffer said: "He'll win the Extel all right."

Yesterday George Robinson, our Newmarket correspondent, told me that it could easily be vindicated because Tapping Wood has answered ever question that his meticulous trainer, Michael Stoute, has asked of him. But Robinson also warns that Tapping Wood will not have everything his own way because Henry Cecil, will be saddling Keen, who is a full-brother to both Kris and Diesis, and he too goes nicely.

The punters' bible will be a closed book after a century of prophetic preaching

On Friday evening the presses at Thomson House, Manchester, will thun-der and roll on the 32,814th and final edition of the northern racing punters' daily bible, the Sporting Chronicle. When the paper has gone to bed for the last time, after 112 years of tipping, betting forecasts and form guides, the staff will repair to a nearby hostelry.

There, says the Sporting Chronicle's editor. Tom Kelly, a 39-year-old Scotsman, "We shall have a little party, perhaps a wake. A few drinks will be consumed, and a few tears will be shad. Jenning lears, since we are a friendly lot and tears, since we are a friendly lot and relationships have always been good."

The Sporting Chronicle will die because its owners, Thomson Withy Grove Ltd. can no longer sustain heavy trading losses. In 1982 these amounted to £1.7m, and since 1975, have amounted to a total of £5.8m. More than 300 jobs will be lost within the total workforce of 2,051 at Thomson Withy Grove, and the redundancies will be right across the board, affecting journalists, advertising staff. affecting journalists, advertising staff, circulation, printing and transport.

Thus will end the long life of the daily racing newspaper that was born in a small Manchester printing shop in 1871. It was the brainchild of Edward Hulton, the compositor who founded the newspaper empire which evenually became Kemsley Newspapers and eventually Thomson Newpapers. Hulton gave his new paper the title The Phrophetic Bell, but within two years had changed the title to the more prosaic and effective Sporting Chronicle. In its heyday as the racegoers' daily mine of exhaustive information and full racecards, Sporting Chronicle had a circulation of 120,000 throughout the country, but this has slumped to the present figure of 33,000.

The reasons, as outlined by Mr Kelly, are easy to understand: competition from the enlarged and the improved racing pages of other daily newspapers, which give a quickly digested basic service, rather than the Sporting Chronicle's voluminous detail; a necessarily big cover price of 35p an issue; the high cost of setting in type a specialist newspaper; a decline in racecourse attendances; and the general effect of the recession on advertising.

Over the years of its century-long existence, the Sporting Chronicle has won a special reputation as an arbiter in all minor sporting disputes, frequently inter-vening to mutual satisfaction in arguments between bookmakers and punters.

Sporting Chronicle

Arthur Wormsley, 50 years a Man-chester journalist and doyen of the sub-editors' table, tells of a legendary character named Bill Wood who was frequently requested to attend sporting challenge matches in a dual role as reporter and arbitrator, and received some weird

On one occasion he was asked to officiate at a rat-catching contest and set off for the venue presuming that it would be a match between terriers. On arrival, he found, to his dismay and a degree of revulsion, that the match was between two men, who sat at one end of a long table with their hands tied behind their backs. At the other end of the table was a sackful of live rats, who were released on a signal. and the contest was decided by the man whose teeth and jaws despatched the larger number of rats as they attempted to run

Not merely was Wood asked to judge the contest, he was given the job of releasing the rats and was given a large glove for his right hand, with precise instructions on how to avoid being bitten. On another occasion Wood was invited to umpire a swimming chalkenge match between two men across Morecambe Bay. He set off alongside the swimmers in a hired rowing boat, but got into difficulties halfway across, fell into the water and unwittingly caused the cancellation of the event, as the swimmers rescued him and brought him back to land. To this day, as Mr Kelly underlined, the letters page is used as an arbitration service.

Mr Kelly is a product of journalism in Edinburgh, starting as an editorial junior in the sports department of an Edinburgh evening newspaper, developing an interest in racing, and pursuing his career in Manchester through to the editor's chair our years ago. His own future is reasonally secure. He will go to London to take up a new part as director and the Retition. new post as director-general of the Betting Offices Licensees Association.

Offices Licensees Association.
Good as some daily newspaper tipsters are, the in-depth professionals are to be found in the pages of the Sporting Chronicle. Dick Adderley has for more than 40 years been one of the most successful tipsters in Britain, with his daily "Beat the Book" forecasts. Five times Adderley has won th £1,000 and gold cup awarded by Sporting Chronicle for the country's best and most consistent tipster. The death of a newspaper is always a moment of sadness for some, heartbreak moment of sadness for some, heartbreak for others. As Tom Kelly says, the demise of the Sporting Chronicle will leave a gaping hole in the world of specialist, deeply-informed racing knowledge.

Tennis does not matter much in China and China does not matter much in tennis. Yesterday, though, two young ladies in their middle twenties suggested that such generalizations may not be valid for much longer. Yu Liquiao, sporting pale green shorts and an elegantly wristy backhand, beat Marianne van der Torre 6-3, 6-0 in the second string match. Then Wang Ping, a soundly match. Why Bombay resists tide of change

From Michael Hamlyn, Delhi

There is a positive passion in trading post there from the local India, as in many former colonial countries, to rename roads, places, buildings, and towns.

Curzon Road in Delhi is now called after Mahatma Gandhi's wife. Chowringhee Road in Calcutta is officially entitled Jawaharlal Nehru Road. Marine Drive in Bombay is called on maps, and almost nowhere else, Netaji Subhash Chandra Bnose Road. Benares is called Varabarsi, Poona had become Pune, and even Baroda has become

But a move to change the name of the biggest commercial centre of them all is being resisted. Bombay contributes almost a third of the total income tax collected in the country, and half of the customs and excise duty. It provides ten per cent of the nation's employ-ment and 13 per cent of its factory output.

objectors cry, if you called is "Mumbai"?

The first inhabitant of one of the seven islands that make up the present day metropolis was the present day metropolis was a little-known goddess called Mumbadevi. Fishermen from the Koli tribe, who inhabited its monsoon-green slopes, and whose descendants still hawk their wares around the tarmac and concrete of today, called their home Mumbai in her honour.

When the Portuguese arrived in the sixteenth century and received the right to establish a sultan they turned the name to Bom Bahia - good bay.

A century later Catharine de Braganza married Charles II of England, and to enhance her attraction in his eyes brought Bom Bahia with her as dowry. It was short work to anglicize it to Bombay. In Marathi and Gujerati, the local tongues, the city is still known as Mumbai. Only in English is it Bombay. A local party of Marathi regionalists called Shiv Sena (named after the robber baron who became ruler of the area, held off both the Moguls and the British and the Moguls and the British and so became a local hero) moved that the name be changed officially.

The proposal has received serious backing but was eventually turned down by the central Government on the ground that the city had risen to world importance as Bombay and so it should stay that way. There the matter rests, but not for long. A leader of the Shiv Sena has promised to continue the struggle. After all, he says, if Peking can still attain world recognition as Beijing why should Bombay do less.

O Dorrie Breeden knew for as long as she can remember that she had a twin sister named Peggy, but it was only in May last year that they were reunited – more than 53 years after being separated in an east London work house.

They were born in 1928 during the depression, their mother an unmarried dumestic servant, their father a Scottish merchant seaman. Dorrie, who had fair hair, was adopted within three weeks by a woman who had lost her own daughter and advertised for a similar little girl as a replacement. Peggy was sent to a children's home before being adopted.

After the 1976 law enabling adopted children to trace their real parents, Dorrie started the search for her twin. Different newspapers, television programmes and the Salvation Army were approached, without success. Then John Strond heard of the quest and put them in touch. Both say they feel they have known each other all their

With Peggy living in Pontefract and Dorrie in Southend, the only big differences between them appear to be due to the worker, John Stroud. Stroud, an official of Hertfordshire County Council social services department, has reunited 26 pairs of twins separated at birth or soon after, usually as a result of adoption of one or both of the pair. In almost every case the twins have been delighted to rediscover each

But after separation lasting as much as 50 years, are twins still as alike as peas in a pod? Even twins raised together can be far from identical in looks, character and temperament, But when The Times recently brought together 10 of the pairs reunited by Stroud, their stories were full of parallels and coincidences.

They are a unique group, their circumstances largely the product of the early years of adoption in the 1920s and 1930s when the separation of orphaned, unwanted or illegitimate twins was not uncommon. Nowadays social workers would separate twins

■ When Peter Clark and John Watts are either side of a room, they do not strike you they could not be anything else. Their mannerisms are too alike, such as the slawly developing grin when they tell a story or the frown-and-pause before they

"In fact, I'm the man from the Pru," Peter Clark said with that hesitant smile. I'm an accountant," added his brother

The events that led to their reunion were et in train by Peter's wife Joan, after she had persoaded a diffident husband to let her try. All of which was to add up to a big surprise for John Watts because he had no dea that he bad a twin.

The search began with a letter to the vicar of Lambourne, in Berkshire, the parish in which the boys were born. But John's adopted parents lived in North London. The first real cine to his whereabouts came from a search of the electoral role at Camden town hall. But John had moved to a village in Cambridgeshire. By chance, the landlady of the house in which he had last lived in North London had kept a letter written seven years before his sister-in-law made her inquiries.

They each have three children. Their tastes are shared in music (Mozart and Beethoven), biographical books, documentary television programmes and gardening as a hobby.

 Barbara Herbert and Daphne Goodship are, right down to their individually crooked little fingers, like the proverbial two peas in a pod,

Nicknamed the Giggle Sisters because of their constant outbursts of identical, raucous laughter, they walk, talk, dress and behave as if one. Blue is their favourite colour, for example; both love reading, family sagas in particular, and each buys the same novel at the same time, without the other's knowledge.... The virtually endless list of similarities might seem to suggest the couple having been inseparable all their lives. Instead they were remitted for the first time in May 1979 - almost 40 years after they were bern, 12 minutes apart, in Hammersmith Their Finnish mother had travelled to England months before the outweak of war intending to learn English, only to find she was eight weeks pregnant. Within weeks of their birth the two girls were separated and

Yet when they met on Kings Cross station four years ago it was as though the huge gap in their lives had never existed. "It was like two friends meeting, as though we had always known each other," started Daphne.

"I was, by chance, standing right opposite the carriage she was in when the train stopped. I just said 'Hi'; it was as cool and calm as that," continued Barbara.

The twins have an uncanny habit throughout a conversation of one starting a sentence, the other completing it, and then, often as not, both saying "yes" in unison.

"We get an uncanny feeling, which is getting worse," Daphne observes, "The last time I was down staying with Barbara, she was talking to a friend. I was in a state where I felt as though I was up in the air looking down on myself. It was as though I was up in the air and Barbara was me, talking. It lasted a few seconds. It was uncanny... and I didn't like it."

Ack them what they have in common and Ask them what they have in common and they are in their element. Barbara went to school in the small Hampshire village of Silchester; years later Daphne and her hunband moved to the area and four of their five children went to the same school. They both last moved house in 1976; their halls are the same colour, they have the same furniture; both have gardens with steps

Jean: "Shejla is much more placid and sedate than I am, but I'm sure she has got : lot cheekier since she met me." Sheila: "I have become a lot more confident since I met Jean."

Chain mail under the microscope

A magnifying apparatus has been urned on to the magnificent Anglo-Savon helmet from York's Copperrate site, which last July was subjected to computerized tomography (a medical X-ray technique) on the body scanner in the local hospital. This time the object was to examine the curtain of chain mail that hung from the back of the helmet to protect the wearer's neck. The rings are only a few millimetres in diameter, and the York Archaeological Trust was anxious to find out how they were made.

There were, it was found, two kinds of rings in alternating rows. The first were made by bending a short length of tron wire into a circle, flattening the ends and punching a rivet hole through. which was then closed with a minuscule rivet. The problem with these rings was that the metal on either side of the rivet hole was very thin, and tended to snap. The second kind of ring was more sophisticated: the ends of the wire were overlapped and then torged together, giving a scarfed joint of great strength which is difficult to detect even with the X-ray photographs enlarging the rings to hundreds of times their actual size. The helmet itself has become the cause of a local controversy. It is at present at the British Museum, where it is undergoing various analyses and some conservation treatment; since the York City Council has gone against expert archaeological and museological advice in insisting that the helmet be displayed in the Castle Museum, just outside the medieval city wall the BM is charging it for the work done to make the piece displayable.

Cast iron

Another piece of ironworking search is reported from central China, here a number of stack-casting moulds and kilns in which the moulds were made have been excavated. In stack-casting, moulds are piled one above the other, and the molten iron trickles down from the "gate" at the top and fills up the moulds from the bottom. The spare metal that solidifies in the runners and sprues leading to the moulds is then broken off and the objects cleaned for despatch and use.

The Chinese used a "white" cast iron, high in carbon, and thus very hard, and consequently needed to keep the runners and sprues as narrow as possible to avoid enormous effort in breaking off the implements themselves. They accomplished this by heating the moulds in a kiln, and pouring in the molten iron while the mould was

The archaeologists at Wenzian in Henan, on the Huang-he River cleaned sets of the moulds of 2,000 years of dirt, relocated them with a protective layer of straw mud, and then heated them.

In the first experiment they were kept at a temperature of 300° centigrade for five hours before the molten tron was poured in. The resulting castings were found to be of low quality, with large holes and excessive shrinkage. Next, the moulds were heated to 600° centigrade for six hours, then allowed to cool to 300° before the iron was poured. All the castings were of high quality except a set of key wedges, which were quite thick, and could apparently have done with a bit more heat.

Another interesting discovery at Wenxian was a master mould: from which as many as 10,000 copies could have been made before the

One answer recently suggested is to sample for organic phosphorus: this is deposited within a living site by the gradual build-up of plant debris, food remains, faeces and urine. At the Romano-British farmstead site of Cefa Graeanog in Gwynedd, North Wales, J. S. Conway of the University College of North Wales at Bangor took soil samples at one-metre intervals from the floors of the excavated huts, and also from neighbouring fields, and then measured the total phosphorus content. The "contour maps" showing phosphorus levels were then subjected to the statistical manipulation of Trend Surface Analysis, which examined the variability in phosphorus distri-

In one building the occupation was found to be confined to the central portion, suggesting beds or benches around the walls, and also indicated the location of the loorway. In another, a high level of phosphorus across the middle suggested two animal stalls, with a central drain down which animal urine flowed. A low level at one end is seen as the site of a manger which would prevent the animals trampling and evacuating there. A third building had two hearths marked by

Lice on ice

One of man's less welcome cohabitants, the body louse, has been identified from a site in Greenland. Recently lice were divided into two species, the head and body louse (with suggestion that the latter may have evolved from the former as clothing was invented), and although head lice are known from Egyptian mummies, from prehispanic Peru, and from a palaeoindian site in Utah remains of the body louse have rarely been found.

The specimen from Kilaersarfik, probably the Sandnes of the Viking sagas, is unlikely to have lived alone: one parasitologist earlier this century recorded a total of 10,428 lice from a single shirt, and Thomas à Becket's hair shirt after his murder was reported to be heavily

Two methods of mea-suring the behaviour of electrons trapped in a calcite lattice, known as thermoluminescence (TL) and elec-tron spin resonance (ESR) have been used, and the Franco-Japanese team led by Yuji Yokoyama have claimed that the Tautavel skull dates to at least half a million years ago, and perhaps to as much as 700,000 years. In contrast, our own Swanscombe Skull from Kent, in the Natural History Museum, is thought to be a mere 250,000 years

Unfortunately for the entente

cordiale, some scientists think the Tautavel skull is only about the same age as Swanscombe, and same of them are British. Dr Ann Wintle, a TL specialist at Cambridge, has reviewed the conflicting claims, and points out that the earlier set of TL and ESR results would indicate a date of about 200,000 years for a travertine just above the archaeological deposit. The new method of ESR dating used by Yokoyama and his associates involves heating the sample, and not everybody agrees that this is a good idea; nor does the dismissal of one set of TL dates as too young (compared with their new measurements) by Yokoyama's team bring agreement. As Dr Wintle notes in a recent review for Nature, "Dating of European Middle Pleistocene hominid remains is a highly controversial affair, and an emotive

Dating pottery

Thermoluminescence (TL) dating has been producing interesting results, and in this case agree with other methods, from the other end of the Old World. W Wang of the Shanghai Museum and Z Zhou of the Shanghai Industrial Hygiene institute, have applied the method to ancient Chinese pottery and compared the ages obtained with those from radiocarbon dating, which is highly accurate for samples less than 10 000 mag. 212 samples less than 10,000 years old.

Pottery from the early rice-growing village of Homodu, near Shanghai, produced TL dates between 5,000 and 6,500 years ago, compared with radiocarbon dates of 5,400 to 6,200 years ago. One of the earliest pottery-making sites in China, at Zengpiyan in Guangxi Province, yielded TL dates of 8,000-

9,000 years age and carbon dates of 7,700-9,000 years. The TL dates were obtained using what is called the "fine-grain" method, but as a check samples from Zengniyan check samples from Zengpiyan were also dated using the TL "quartz inclusion" technique which measures larger pieces of quartz temper from the pottery fabric. This method gave seven dates ranging from 7,000 to 10,300 years ago.

Two periods of occupation have been identified by archaeologists working there, and the Oxford TL laboratory (whose director, Dr Martin Aitken, has just been elected FRS) has produced dates averaging 12,500 plus/minus 1,150 years ago for the earlier, Palaeolithic occupation, and 9750 plus/minus 750 years ago for the succeeding Mesolithic. Both occupations were of hunters, living in the open.

Antler combs

It seems that Roman and medieval craftsmen preferred to use antier rather than the more available bone for making small objects such as combs, because antler was much tougher. Experiments using an Instron 1122 table testing me usually used for industrial terials have shown that antier is 30 per cent more flexible than bone while treing equally strong, and takes 2.7 times

Antier combs were made with short toothed sections fastened side by side in between two plates, not for ease of replacement when some teeth broke, as had been suggested but because only short sections could be made with the teeth cut along the grain rather than across it; antler, like bone, is much stronger and more flexible in the direction of

Mirage at the bottom of the garden

It a journalist starts an article with the words: "In this current, unending spell of hot, dry weather". It is a very good guarantee that between the time he writes the words and the time they appear in print, the weather will break and Britain become cool, wet and unendingly grey again. As we need the rain, though, I think it right to usher in a wet spell by using those very words. those very words.

In this current, unending spell of hot, dry weather, gardeners need different advice from the usual tips about watering and hosing. It's all very well telling them to throw washing-up water on the garden, but at a time when we are eating cherries and chewing cucumbers for every meal, there isn't a great deal of washing-up water around. So, here are a few real-tips for hotweather gardeners.

Cactus, Yuccas etc. Now is the time to root out rain-loving plants from your garden and replace them with desert growths such as cacti. The eight to ten foot high ones are the best, as they give a great deal of shade and flower delightfully every 30 years or so. They need no care or 30 years or so. They need no care of attention from gardeners: to put it another way, you can sit back in a deckchair reading a novel and when asked why you are not gardening, as you said you would, you can say: "On the contrary, I am engaged full-time in giving my succulents just the treatment they need."

Seeds. You have probably seen film on television of the Australian desert or the South African veldt full of brilliant flowers and, then heard David Attenborough saying: "It only requires one shower of rain to turn an apparently empty desert into something like Kew gardons overnight."
Now is the time to sow those flowers. Send up to the BBC Natural History Unit, saying: "Yes! Please rush me a giant packet." of David Attenborough desert seeds which lie dormant for many years and then grow full-size overnight! I have paid my licence fee, and bought his book."

Garden hoses. Hoses are only illegal at the moment if used for water. They can also be used quite legally to create a wonderful fairy-light effect. Thread them through your trees, winding electric cable around them and dangling light sockets at intervals. Turn them on at night, and heypresto - you have your own outdoor restaurant just like that wonderful one you ate in one night in Ibiza and the children were so ill the next morning. Slip on the record you bought at the same time you know, the one which you got the band to sign, personally and which has been under the stairs since you got back from holiday.

Grass. In many parts of the world such as Africa and the USA lawns have been replaced by picturesque, easy-to-tend stretches of sand. Simply buy sand and spread it over your lawn, creating a novel, truly equatorial vista. For added authentic effect, half-bury broken Roman columns. bleached antiers, or rusty relics of some long-forgotten battle. If your garden is big have your own mirages. There is nothing quite so delightful on a hot summer day as crawling on hands and knees along your sandy garden, croaking: "Water, water!". then going indoors to make a jug of Pimms.

Drinking beles. This unending spell of hot, dry weather is very cruel on wildlife; remember to leave out a large bowl of water for any passing hyena, camel, vulture or desert fox. If at night you should hear a commotion or scuffling round the water, stay indoors and leave well alone. Animals do not always recognize their benefactors

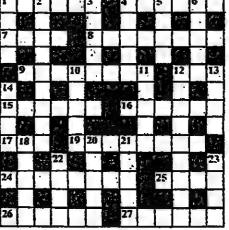

Palm trees. Palms do not generally grow well enough in Britain to produce edible fruit. Better and quicker to buy a few coconuts and leave them lying half-hidden round the estate. If you miscalculate your crawl through the garden and become genuinely stranded through heat and exhaustion, before you get to that Pimms you may well be grateful for a life-restoring draught of coconut milk.

Lost German tourists. German travellers are generally more intrepid than the rest of us, and some experts say that no stretch of sand is complete without at least one parched citizen of Hamburg. In my experience; though, they are more trouble than they are worth, as they usually bring their family to stay later, in gratitude for being rescued.

Forgiving the Fenwoman

The message to Mary Chamberlain from some of the Fenwomen whose lives she chronicled eight years ago was short and to the point: "Show your face in this village again and you'll be lynched."

مكذا من الأحل

In 1972 Isleham was a welcoming place. She had moved there from the city to buy a little land and "drop out with hens and goats." She ended up writing a classic. Her portrait of village life was the first book to be published by the Virago feminist Isleham was an untidy village on the edge of the Fens. A landscape of flat land and hard lives. In Mary's eyes there were no roses round the door, or honey for tea:

At the time Akenfield was enjoying popularity and colonred the city-dweller's view of the country life. But where were all the women in Ronald Blythe's book? The chapters were mostly devoted to men: there were the craftsmen, officers and gentlemen, the orchard men - even God, Mary determined to redress the balance. The idea of Fenwomen - the feminist antidote to Akenfield - was born.

History is as much about women bringing up a family on nine shillings a week as about men's deeds and diplomatic decisions' Over two years, with the aid of a tape recorder, she made history out of women's voices. She disguised the names of the women whose lives she recorded in detail, and changed the name of the village to Gislea.

Mary talked to three generations of women who told stories of marriage and childbirth, washing and cooking gleaning and weeding, stretching back more than 150 years. Their own feelings that their lives were less important than those of their husbands made her only more determined to set down their stories.

The older women talked about their girlhood. With little brothers and sisters to care for, it ended early. The little girls talked about growing older. They wanted to be nurses, hairdressers, mothers. The younge women talked about sex. That's what caused Mary Chamberlain's love affair with the village to turn

A few days before publication, while the book reviewers were preparing favourable phrases "strong and moving" (Sunday Times), "solid social history" (Times Educational Supplement) - two men visited the village. Mary, who had moved to a teaching job in lpswich, was back showing friends

"One of the men pulled out a copy of the book and asked me if I'd seen it. Seen it? Of course. I wrote it." That was that; a quote and a picture of a smiling Mary, book in hand.

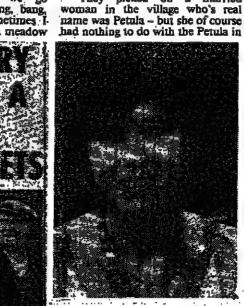

Next Sunday, under the headline "Why Mary Unveiled a Village's Love Secrets", and "There'll be Red Faces Down on the Farm When This Book Comes Out', the News of

While this game of who's who (or who's sleeping with whom) was going on, the villagers felt betrayed.

"They saw my picture in the paper and assumed I had made thousands of pounds from selling their stories to the The News of the World. In their eyes I had done it to sell more copies of my book. I had exploited them, not the paper." She called a public meeting immediately to put her case. Tempers were high and the older people who had been outraged by the sex in the book sat with arms folded in the front row. "We're not reading that filth", said one. Others were peeved that they had not been mentioned. "What moved me most was the attitude of Petula's husband. He had suffered more than most from teasing, particularly as the fictitional Petula had remarked that they no longer had sex very often. Yet he stood up to defend me, and his speech turned the meeting right Since then Mary has been back

FIRST PERSON

A deep-moted fear of all things medical has always prevented me from paying much attention to the National Health Service versus private medicine debate. But having fallen victim to the chronic bad press the NHS so lavishly receives, I decided a long time ago that, in the event, private medicine was probably the lesser of the two evils.

I have no criticism to make about private medical care. My three experiences of private hospitals were no better and no worse than I expected. But a recent and sudden which it toils may not necessarily be the whole picture.

A few weeks ago circumstances forced me to consult a general practitioner under the NHS. The bleak and outdated conditions of his surgery, which he runs entirely single-handed, is a dreadful and damning indictment of the health service. But the doctor was sharp and wise and he diagnosed by instinct and experience rather than by modern medical technology.

He deemed the matter urgent, though not an emergency, and telephoned Charing Cross Hospital for an immediate appointment. There was a time lapse of about an hour between leaving the surgery and seeing the doctor at Charing

To the NHS, with thanks Cross. So much for the myth about much urgent journalistic business interminable waiting lists, queues and delays on the NHS.

The official clinic was over by this time and I saw the doctor in what, presumably, was his lunch break. I immediately confessed my neurosis about doctors, bospitals and all their associations - a problem many a private doctor has treated with barely concealed disdain. But the attitude of this doctor was one of total understanding.

The problem was an abdominal tumour whose existence I had refused to acknowledge and which had now grown to Guinness Book of Records proportions. I should have been admitted immediately, but the doctor appreciated that I had left an unattended dog at home, as well as and other commitments, so it was arranged that I should return at 9 pm. I can barely tolerate sickness in myself and I could never be a witness to illness in others and I knew I would crack up completely in hospital ward. Before I returned that evening I had already decided to bock my house, if necessary, and ask the consultant to attend me privately. In consideration of my problem, however, I had been assigned a private room and bathroom. So much for the myth about impersonal, conveyor-belt treatment on the NHS.

None of my whims (no visitors, for example), were treated with the contempt they deserved. Af all times the doctors and nurses were enormously and consistently tolerant, patient and kind. The operation took place after two days of promptly executed tests. The tumour was found to be malignant and will necessitate further surgery. I have now had time to ponder all the alternatives but I have chosen to return and continue treatment at Charing Cross

I recognize my great fortune at living in the area covered by Charing Cross, a modern and largely unintimidating hospital, and my even greater fortune at falling into the hands of particularly sympathetic and caring as well as skilful team of doctors. I doubt whether my experience is unique

Fifteen days before their wedding day, which was set for July 4 1974, Anatoly disappeared along with other potential trouble-makers who, the Kremlin thought, might cause problems during President Nixon's visit to Moscow.

Avital was told she must leave Russia within ten days, "I said I wouldn't go unless I could marry Anatoly first. They released him the day before our wedding and said

Here on the Costa del Camden Town at the weekend the streetmarket gutters ran scarlet with squashed strawberries. Tumbling heaps of lacquer-bright cherries, punnets of soft pink raspberries and redcurrants; tart and almost trans-parent, cried "buy me, buy me" at every turn. This stunning weather is producing the finest soft fruits I have seen for years and, with everything ripening at once, it may be one of the briefest too.

To show off these lovely fruits, serve them with cremets, the light called coeur à la crème when it it is made in heart-shaped moulds. Use the same slightly sweetened mixture with freshly baked scones and ripe strawberries for a proper tea on the sunshine for winter days in a batch of clear, scarlet redcurrant jelly.

To make yogurt curd cheese for the following recipe, beat the 450 ml (1/2 pint) natural yogurt to make it liquid, then tip it into a sieve lined with butter muslin or cheesecloth. Knot the corners and hang the muslin bag to drain for about 12 hours, or overnight. Put a bowl under the bag to catch the whey which drips from the yogurt as it dries and firms.

Beat the yogurt curd cheese until it is smooth. Whip the cream until it holds soft peaks. Combine the cheese, cream and sugar and beat them lightly together.

If you have coeur la crème moulds (they must have drain holes in the bottom), line them with butter muslin or cheese cloth. Alternatively, line a sieve with muslin to make a large dome of the cheese mixture which can be turned out and covered or surrounded with fruit. Spoon the mixture into the mould or moulds and press it well into the shape. Stand the moulds on a plate to catch the whey, or over a bowl if using a sieve, and refrigerate them until they are well risen and golden. Real redcurrant jelly is a preserve that I do not like to run out of, but still I never seem to make enough of it to last from one summer to the next I serve it with roast lamb and use it to glaze open fruit tarts.

Redcurrant jelly Makes about 2.7 kg (6 lbs) 2.7 kg (6 lbs) ripe redcurrents Sugar (see method)

Wash the redcurrants and pick out any that are bad or mouldy. Put them, stalks and all, into a preserving pan, or another large and preferably wide-mouthed pan or casserole, and add 1.2 litres (2 pints) of water. Heat gently until the juice starts to run from the fruit, then simmer for half an hour, pressing the berries against the sides of the pan so that the skin of each is broken. Tip the fruit pulp into a scalded jelly bag and leave it to drip overnight. (To improvize a jelly bag, line a large sieve with a clean, damp tea cloth. Tip in the pulp then gather up and knot the corners.) Next, measure the juice and put it back in the pan. Stir in 450 g (1 lb) sugar for every 600 ml (1 pint) of juice. Heat the mixture gently, until the Sugar has dissolved completely, then boil fast to obtain a set. Test whether the jelly will set when cold by dropping a small spoonful on to a chilled plate. If it thickens and begins to form a skin it will set. A sugar thermometer will register about 104°C/220°F when the jelly reaches setting point.

Quickly strain the jelly through a sieve lined with muslin and pour it into hot, very clear jars. Fit a waxed paper disc wax side down on the surface of the jelly and, when it is completely cold, seal the jars with transparent jam pot covers. Label and store the pots in a cool, dark

From Vivienne Hughes, Cottenham,

In "these days of equality of the sexes" referred to in Michael Waters's column (Wednesday Page, July 13), I find his attitudes unhelpful and insulting to the 52 per cent of married women who are working wives. I have a full-time ob, as does my husband.

Michael Water's assertion that "it goes without saying that part of any husband's pay is really for the services of his wife," smacks of Victorian servitude. I applaud Ms Drummond's (or Mrs Waters's) efforts in handling her own tax affairs. It would be simpler and fairer if married couples with joint incomes could always be taxed separately without punitive measures when their total joint income fails below a certain threshold.

Colin Hanoman, the man who changed his name to Margaret Thatcher in hope of contesting Finchley at the general election, is proud of a letter he received from Tony Benn after announcing his intention to lodge an election petition against the returning officer's ruling that he was "an obvious unreality." Benn writes:
"People fought and died for the right to vote. Do not mock it by farce." Hanoman has indeed abandoned his bid to have the Finchley poll nullified not because of what he calls Benn's "very pro-Establish-ment response", but because he cannot raise the money.

The challenge of illustrating this almost unsewable theme appealed, at any rate, to Lady Liewelyn-Davies of Hastoe. When it came to her turn to question MacGregor she said: "I have no questions. I am going to embroider a sampler."

The table shows some of the projections from the original med ium term financial strategy compared with how events turned out. The table shows that the fall in inflation owes nothing to the Government having stuck to its money supply targets, because those targets were substantially exceeded. The Government proved unable to control either the money supply or public spending. The Government failed to understand that the effect of spending cuts and a high exchange rate policy was to cut output. This reduced tax What they argued was that cutting revenue and increased social securpublic spending and increasing taxes would reduce output and employity spending. As a result, public spending and borrowing were chronically out of their control. Output consistently disappointed

the Government's expectations. The number of occasions on which the Government announced a new dawn only to be "disappointed" is now beyond number. At no time did any upturn seem likely to achieve either an output level or a growth rate comparable with 1979. This experience should serve as a warning against placing too much weight on the latest of these fluctuations in output. If, as Tim Congdon claims, the current upturn owes nothing to public sector stimulus, then why did the Chancellor see the need for emergency cuts in public spending?

We now have inflation at a level which would I imagine, be consist-ent with the ambitions of the founders of the medium-term financial strategy. Yet none of them now suggests that we are about to see a substantial improvement in employment. They seem to have lost their faith in even that tenet of the strategy. On the contrary, falling inflation has so far been accompanied by stagnant output and falling employment.

We may or may not have learnt much about economic theory from this experiment, but if we had known in 1980 what we know now I doubt if anyone would adopt the Same course.

You see, the Swiss worker, poor devil, is afflicted by such dreadful inflation (deliberately engineered by the iron-heeled capitalists and their allies the governmental gnomes) that no amount of wages can keep body and soul together, whence the frightful conditions hereinbeforementioned. Got it?

Not quite: Switzerland, for all practical purposes, doesn't have inflation at all; if it goes above 2 per cent it is regarded as a national emergency, and flood-warnings are broadcast hourly to all parts of the

Yes, well. On the other hand. But. The fact is, of course, that unemployment in Switzerland is raging at such unspeakably high levels that no worker dare ask, Oliver-like, for more, lest he be thrown instantly on to the scrap-

At this point, if your sample of British union leaders is really representative, you are likely to get a vigorous punch in the head; it was Burns who observed that facts are chiels that winns ding and daurna be disputit, and although I would not presume to say exactly what he meant by the remark, its general drift seems to be that Socrates should have counted himself lucky to suffer nothing worse than a thorough poisoning for telling people things they did not wish to hear. Most emphatically, our union leaders do not want to hear about the Swiss system of industrial relations or its architect Mr Konrad

I can now return to my theme of last week. British trade union leaders have the power to keep their members poor. That is not a very glorious power - it would hardly have sufficed Napoleon or Sardanapalus - but such as it is, they have it. The question is: why do they choose to exercise it?

Like the union men in Merthyr Tydfil who filled in a grave just before the burial because it had been dug in defiance of a strike that included gravediggers, trade union leaders who believe that their members still go to work in clogs are fighting the class war before last because nobody has taught them how to use power for good ends rather than bad, or even for sensible purposes rather than idiotic. It has been repeatedly pointed out, not least by me, that the American worker doesn't mind if the boss has a larger Cadillac this year than last, provided that he has a larger Ford. Why is the British worker willing to be Fordless to ensure that the boss is Rollsless?

The answer, I believe, is that he isn't, but that his union leaders have the power to ensure that he behaves as though he is. And the most encouraging movement to be observed today anywhere in British industry - more encouraging than any signs that the recession is ending - is that of the British industrial worker's revolt against his leaders' power. In last month's election 60 per cent of the votes cast by trade union members were for candidates other than Labour ones; it is hardly posible to imagine a clearer demonstration that they were rejecting an attitude that simply did not accord with their own aspirations or indeed their own view of reality.

And the miners elected Mr Scargill their president by an immense majority, but have ever since greeted with thumb to nose his demands that they should lower their standard of living in order to keep him in metaphors.

The Labour Party is shortly going to find itself with Mr Kinnock as leader; the party might as well affiliate en masse to Exit. But it will not escape notice that this result will have been achieved largely through the squalid dealings of a few trade union bosses delivering herds of spurious votes like cattle-rustlers. The Labour Party is beyond saving: but the trade union movement can still be resuscitated by its members. The trade union legislation proposed by the Government has been criticized as too weak, but the critics miss the point, for the main object is not to impose harsher limits on trade union activities, it is to further separate the boneheads who lead the unions from the members who are dragged, by the boneheads' inca-pacity for using power, into avoid-able poverty. They are also dragged by their leaders into serious losses of liberty (not to mention into activities which deprive others of liberty), but that is less pressing, and less obvious, than the fact that the union leaders are denying their tnembers attainable material advancement. Mr Tebbit said in the last Parliament that he was going to give the unions a dose of democracy, It is an audacious proposal; nothing less than taking the power from the bosses who have shown themselves unfit to use it and putting it into the hands of the members, who are now showing signs of wanting to learn how it should be used. It is perhaps too much to hope that British trade union members, even then, will promptly adopt the Swiss system devised by Mr Konrad Ilg. But at least they have begun to realize that his way is preferable to that of Mr Soloman Binding.

There is no great mystery about why this should happen inder all Tory governments (and some Labour ones as well). For years we have sought to encourage home ownership, particularly by allowing mortgage interest (unlike other forms of interest) to be set off against tax. We have been highly successful: and so milions of households feel the pinch when mortgage rates go up, and tend to love the government when they come down again.

Now I am all for home ownership.

I thought there was no more telling comment on the recent general election than Tony Benn's cry from the heart about all those council houses with fancy door-knockers, which meant they had been sold. I have little doubt that the right to buy the family home was the single biggest vote-winner introduced by the 1979 government.

But I do sometimes wonder whether we may not have rather over-egged the pudding. If your Aunt Mabel leaves you £50,000, and you use it to buy shares in ICI, then, if those shares appreciate in real value, you will pay capital gains tax on the appreciation; and on the dividends you receive you may well have to pay investment income surcharge on top of income tax. And with all that, the shares you buy are just as likely to go down as up.

If, instead, you buy a house to live in, you can in due course sell it and pocket any gain you make - and on the trend of more than 30 years you will be most unlucky not to bave a gain, Meanwhile the Chancellor will help you meet the cost of your purchase. Who would buy ICI shares instead? Yet is house purchase transparently more "in the national interest" than industrial invest-

I am not suggesting that with a move to tax neutrality between house purchase and other forms of personal lavestment, prime ministers would lose their interest in the mortgage rate. We should at least need to take it out of the retail price index (where it does not really belong) as well. Still, the intensity of interest might diminish. So that is one change which my friend from the building societies might cam-paign for, I bet he does not, all the

There remains another change which could get the politicians permanently out of the building societies' hair. They could scrap the mortgage rate cartel, and leave the individual societies to pick the rates that suit them. Perhaps, with the help of some energetic elbow-work from our new Chancellor, they might before too long do precisely

A small price to pay for the facts

The proposal for a Labour newspaper has provoked a lively correspondence, but the idea is not likely to get off the ground. Bill Keys, general secretary of Sogat\82 and the main driving force behindit, had great difficulty in persuading colleagues from other unions to fund even a modest feasibility study. If it came to putting up substantial cash for the paper itself, most union leaders would back off.)

This is partly because the unions are in financial difficulties. Union membership has fallen by 1.6 million since the end of 1981, mainly because of rising unemploy-ment. Many unions have found it difficult to make economies to match the fall in revenue.

Nevertheless, the trade union movement clearly has the resources to fund its own daily if it wishes. But in its present defensive and demoralized state, it is not in a mood to attempt a high-risk venture. Con-servative legislation has whittled away the unions' legal immunities, leaving them vulnerable to large damages. Closed shep ballots, which will come into force next year, may further reduce union membership. There is no real sign of a sustained economic recovery In these circumstances, the instinct of many union executives will be to husband their resources in readiness for the worsening situation ahead.

In any case, union leaders have not given high priority to communicating with the general public or even with their own members. They allowed the Daily Herald to close in 1964, even though its readership was more than five times that of The Times. Trade union journals remain, with a few exceptions, under-financed and over-controlled. Even union support for the development of a sympathetic press is limited.

The unions' failure over the years to develop properly their own media has contributed to their present crisis. Most union members obtain information about unions primarily from media with a marked anti-union bias. This bias, as the systematic studies by the Glasgow University Media Group, Dr Paul Hartmann (Leicester University) and Professor Denis McQuail (Amsterdam), reveal, generally takes the unobtrusive form of industrial relations reports that focus on the disruptive consequences of disputes without explaining their causes. Strikers are implicitly hortrayed as irrational and causing trouble without good reason, because their motives are not explained.

This is often coupled with a failure on the part of industrial paul Pickering journalists to interrogate management as they do trade unionists.

Professor McQuail found, for The author is editor of New Socialist.

instance, that statements and actions by employers accounted for only per cent of the main topics of industrial relations reports of the national daily press in 1975. By rendering employers "invisible". and by concentrating on the wider disruptive effects of disputes, industrial journalists often tacitly portray unionists as being in conflict not so much with their employers as with the public. This bias against the unions has contributed to the growing loss of support for unions even among their members. In these circumstances, union leaders have no real choice but to develop their own mass media as an elementary act of self-But they need to do so with their eyes open. The McCarthy Report, commissioned by the TUC, seriously funderestimates the cost of launching a new popular daily by making three false assumptions: . That it would carry about the same proportion of advertising as the Sun, the established market leader, despite charging higher rates per thousand readers. That advertising would rise in strict proportion to sales (which it practically never does). This would give the new paper a whopping £6.4m profit on a circulation of 500,000, whereas the Daily Mail generally makes a loss with a circulation of more than 1.5m.

 And, most surprisingly, the report imagines that revenue would cover current expenditure within two to three months of the launch - a feat not matched in radical newspaper journalism since Feargus O'Connor sunched the Northern Star in 1837.

Some assumptions made by the report about the editorial content of the paper are also open to question. Lord McCarthy rightly stresses the need for editorial independence, and builds in institutional safeguard to achieve this. But he is unrealistic in believing that a paper with a tiny editorial staff (a mere 17 per cent of the number employed, for example, on The Times) could produce a paper "offering new standards of excellence in British journalism." The new paper would need bigger funds than the £6.7m projected by Lord McCarthy. But this cost, even if underestimated is small by comparison with the price which unions, and their members, would pay for not effectively putting across their case. It is a pity that the present generation of union leaders is not far-sighted enough to recognize this.

Three Secretarial Opportunities for a New Venture in the Oil Industry

It is rare to have the chance to be involved in the launch of an entirely new company: these are three such chances.

As leading merchant bankers we are assisting a major British client in setting up a new organisation to manage its oil interests. To work closely with the executive team in this new company we are seeking to fill the following positions immediately.

Senior Secretary
Good education (might suit graduate). Highest integrity:
Experience as secretary to senior management.
Administrative and leadership qualities. Shorthand and accurate typing.

Secretary
Experience in financial/accounting environment.
Schedule typing. Receptionist/Secretary

To assist management generally.

Accurate typing, Shorthand desirable. These positions are initially on a contract basis of one year to launch the organisation into its first phase. It is envisaged that continuing employment opportunities will be offered to staff engaged in the initial phase, subject to satisfactory service and on terms to be negotiated at the time. During the first phase the company will be located in the City of London

Applicants must possess a mature personality, enjoy high professional standards and be self-motivated and adaptable, probably aged mid-twenties upwards. Although previous oil industry experience would be a distinct advantage it is not a prerequisite.

Candidates for all three positions should have knowledge of or be willing to be trained in the operation of word processors (Oliveti) and telex machines. If you find the prospect of being in at the start of a major new venture with a lively and interesting future, please write giving full details of age, education, training and career to date, to \sim

The surge in house prices we have seen in the last six months is tempting owners of near-derelict cottages, standing on small plots, for £67,000, the other for £70,000 country cottages to sell. Leading hardly the sort of prices many country agents report a sharp rise in buyers would consider as suitable demand for all types of rural homes, but notably for cottages in for a weekend or holiday retreats. But the price of a cottage with a sizable plot can really soar. The firm expects to sell Winterfields Buyers, however, should steel themselves for a shock when it comes to negotiating the price. Do Farm, a three-bedroomed thatched home on almost 27 acres at Pulborough, probably by auction, and say it has already attracted considerable interest. It is described as "ripe for modernization" (which probably means in need of total renovation). The agents say they expect the £100,000 guide price will be sweeded.

Pearsons of Hampshire, agents with more than 20 offices throughout southern England, have also noted increasing demand for cottages in need of complete modernization. The firm is offering two adjoining thatched cottages in the north Hampshire village of Overton, eight miles from Basings-toke and four miles from the M3

As a pair they would cost about £55,000, and a total renovation moment, however, Pearsons are offering the properties separately as improvement grants may be obtainable if they remain as two homes.

One of them, No 7, Bridge Street, dates back to 1580. It is a timberframed, semi-detached dwelling which includes a large inglenook fireplace and bread-oven in the sitting-room. There are four rooms downstairs, two upstairs, and there is a garden. The cottage next door is believed to have been constructed in 1750. The ground floor has a sitting-room also with inglenook and bread-oven and a kirchen. There are two bedrooms above,

If the thought of living on a building site is a tiresome prospect there are opportunities to buy a renovated thatched country cottage in the New Forest, though Lymington agents Jackson & Jackson say that the comment of the property of of the proper that charming period cottages are fairly rare there.

Paul Jackson, one of the partners points out that the New Forest has always been a fairly underdevel-oped area. "This has led in modern times to a real dearth of older properties with character, so an owner of a thatched cottage has really valuable asset," he says. His firm has on the marke examples of cottages which have been renovated without regard to cost. Peckhams Cottage at Min-stead is a 300-year-old half-timbered property with a garden and paddock extending to about two acres. Offers around £110,000 are The other property, called Rowleys Holb, is on the edge of Beaulieu village. It has recently been re-wired and re-thatched. One of its interesting features is a galleried drawing-room. There are a four bedrooms, two bathrooms and a further reception room. The house stands on one-third of an acre. The asking price is £123,000. Further up market is Eaton Cottage, near Congleton, Cheshire, which is in the hands of the Chester office of Strutt & Parker Leathes & Bickerton. Since the detached house was built almost 200 years ago it has had only three owners. The property stands in just over nine acres and the agents are seeking offers around £175,000.

 Worlds Apart, a documentary series about communities that, for one reason or another, live in tion, away from the rest of their country's population, begins with THE MURIA (BSC 2 9.30pm). This 85,000 strong tribe live in Central Incle, near the Tibetan border, in an area completely encircled by mountains. Far from eing poor and primitive, the Muria e landowners, self-sufficient and, in one way, more progressive than Westerners. When their children reach puberty they leave the parental home to live in a communal globul. —a kind of enlightened youth club where, the theory ones, they leave to be adult. theory goes, they learn to be adult.

Yesterday Miss Lynda King Taylor, the journalist who flew to the Isle of Scilly four days before the fatal accident, denied points made by Mr Michael Ginn, managing director of BA Helicopters, quoted in The Times yesterday.

She denied that she had travelled with a press party, as Mr Ginn had suggested, but rather on a later flight in the company of other tourists. She repeated that they had been allowed to roam freely about the aircraft, taking photo-graphs while the seat belt signs were illuminated

She also said that Mr Ginn's assertion that BA had supplied the police with a full passenger list two hours after the accident did not correspond with the Exeter police's account; they said they had been hampered in identifying bodies by the absence of a full passenger list.

Local hotelliers, she added had said they had been working had been said to be said to be late on Saturday night helping the police by ringing round to check on which holidaymakers had failed to arrive at their

Mr Ginn did not respond to Miss King Taylor's other allegations that the emergency exit signs were not pointed out and were not manned by cabin and were not manned by cann staff; they were, she said, obstructed by hand luggage. Nor did he respond to her allegations that the brief safety announcement was inaudible and that there were no safety instructions in her seat, or in those of two

Mr David Learmont, a former RAF pilot and editor of the air transport section of the magazine Flight International. said yesterday that the points detailed by Miss King Taylor, if correct, amounted to extreme sloppiness on the airline's part.

By David Nicholson-Lord

Just a fraction of a century uger than the institution she has served so faithfully for so long, Salvation Army Comioner Catherine Bramwell Booth celebrates her hundredth birthday today in the rural seclusion of her home at Finchampstead, near Wokingham. Berkshire.

Appearances of retirement are deceptive, however. Exactly 118 years after the army was founded by her grandfather, the commissioner's uniform is as crisp and neat as ever, her teetotal convictions maltered and her belief in God, the Devil and the vital business of saving souls intact. Over the last century, she says, she has bad some "wonderful times with the some "v

More particularly, she has developed her own distinctive brand of spreading the word. She has appeared on television chat shows. She has been honoured by the Guild of Toastmasters. She has given 30 interviews already this year. She is, in the words of one senior Salvation Army official, "the best public relations officer we've got".

Son of Civilization fights the Beast

Yesterday brought the first day of a two-day defence debate, as well as the ministerial debut of Mr Alan Clark.
He is the son of one of the most famous Britons of the age: the recently-deceased Lord Clark. But he decided to make his own way in the world. So he did not join the family business, civilization, but he went into Conservative politics instead.

He arrived on the back benches in 1974. He is an expert on defence and has never been identified with such subjects as, say employ-

So, when he was finally brought into the Government after the general election, he was of course sent to the Department of Employment.

At question time yesterday, as the new under secretary, Mr Clark, a notable questioner when on the back benches, found himself giving his first parliamentary answer.

Mr Clark talked about "the success of the pilot scheme." He seemed confident of his knowledge, pilots being the sort of people about whom he displayed knowledge when asking questions concerning his old subject of defence. He was, however, answering a Toru backbencher who had asked him about the progress of special employment and training facilities.

Flying under the radar

While Mr Clark was talking about pilot schemes. Mr Dennis Skinner, the back-bencher who used to sit directly opposite him whea Mr Clark was a backbencher, tried to fly in under Mr Clark's

As Mr Clark moved towards the dispatch box, his starboard was the target of precision heckling from Mr Skinner a few yards below: "Not very ebullient now, i

she?...eez a bag o' nerves
...not the same is it?"
Wisely, and unlike in the old days, Mr Clark did not exchange shots with Mr Skinner. Instead, he concentrated trated on satisfying his Tory backbench questioner and landed his brief safely. But in this confrontation between Mr Skinner and Mr Clark, The Beast of Rolsover versus The

Mr Skinner has been having a relatively quiet Parliament so far. We sense in speaking too carly with five years to go. He has been confirming himself to an average of a heckle a day, apart from two per Prime Minister's question tions yesterday, he asked a question about Freemasons.. He implied that Freemasons were influential or powerful. In this belief, Mr Skinner was part of a great tradition which includes the Inquisition, Mozart's cuemies, Hitler, and General Franco, who it may be remembered, is said to have warned against the Freemasons on his deathbed. What do they, and Mr Skinner, know that we do not? He demanded of Mr John Selwyn Gummer, another Under Secretary at Employ-ment, whether the Government was going to bring in a law to regulate internal elections within freemasonry, as it intended to regulate elections within trade unionism. His point appeared to be to emphasize the unfairness of the government regulating election in one organization. but not in another. Mr Gummer replied that, unlike unions, freemasons did not enjoy legal immunities. That was why the Government thought their elections should be regulated. At this, Mr Skinner scoffed and pointed his finger across the Conservative benches, implying that they were heaving with unregulated freemasons enjoying legal immunities. "Ah, you'll not touch them," be cried. It could be that the Conservative backbenches are far less interesting than Mr Skinner is trying to suggest.

Later, the defence debate passed off without serious incident. A balance of tedium was maintained between Mr Michael Heseltine, the Sec-retary of State, and Mr John Silkin, the chief Opposition spokesman on defence, such as kept the peace during the recent general election and enabled the country to be safely bored by their endless

National Day

Today Colombia celebrates its National Independence Day com-memorating the declaration of independence from Spain by the componente from Spain by the component parts of the Viceroyalty of New Granada, in 1810. The Barile of Boyaca in 1819 finally secured the freedom of New Granada, consisting of present-day Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador and Panama. The federation lasted little more than a decade homeoner. more than a decade, however, before Venezuela and Ecuador seceded. Panama declared its independence in 1903, taking advantage of the disorder caused by a three-year civil war. Colombia is a two-party democracy; the last military coup was in 1953.

Commenting on British foreign policy, the Frankfurter Rundschan points to the "lack of far-sight". Political solutions would be possible in Northern Ireland and the Falklands, but "diplomacy is not in demand". Almost no dialogue with the Soviet Union, contacts to the wrong side in Latin America, quiet lifting of pressure on South Africa -still the former empire determines the British political conciousness.
